to the E. of Jucatan, and as many to the S. or Cape Florida; and commands the entrance of the gulphs both of Mexico and Florida, as also the windward passages. By this situation it may be called the key of the West-Indies. It was discovered by Columbus in 1492, who gave it the name of Ferdinando, in honour of king Ferdinand of Spain; but it quickly after recovered its ancient name of Cuba. The natives did not regard Columbus with a very favourable eye at his landing; and the weather proving very tempestuous, he soon left this island, and sailed to Hayta, now called Hispaniola, where he was better received. The Spaniards, however, soon became masters of it. By the year 1511, it was totally conquered; and in that time they had destroyed, according to their own accounts, several millions of people. But the possession of Cuba was far from answering the expectations of the Spanish adventurers, whose insatiable avarice could be satiated with nothing but gold. These monsters finding that there was gold upon the island, concluded that it must come from mines; and therefore tortured the few inhabitants they had left, in order to extort from them a discovery of the places where these mines lay. The miseries endured by these poor creatures were such, that they almost unanimously resolved to put an end to their own lives, but were prevented by one of the Spanish tyrants, called Vasco Porcellos. This wretch threatened to hang himself along with them, that he might have the pleasure, as he said, of tormenting them in the next world worse than he had done in this; and so much were they afraid of the Spaniards, that this threat diverted these poor savages from their desperate resolution. In 1511, the town of Havannah was built, now the principal place on the island. The houses were at first built only of wood; and the town itself was for a long time so inconsiderable, that in 1536 it was taken by a French pirate, who obliged the inhabitants to pay 700 ducats to save it from being burnt. The very day after the pirate's departure, 3 Spanish ships arrived from Mexico, and having unloaded their cargoes, sailed in pursuit of the pirate ship. But such was the cowardice of the officers, that the pirate took all the 3 ships, and returning to the Havannah, obliged the inhabitants to pay 700 ducats more. To prevent misfortunes of this kind, the inhabitants built their houses of stone; and the place has since been strongly fortified. See HAVANNAH.

According to the Abbé Raynal, the Spanish settlement at Cuba is very important, on 3 accounts: 1. The produce of the country, which is considerable. 2. As being the staple of a great trade; and, 3. As being the key to the West Indies. The principal produce of this island is cotton. The commodity commodity, however, through neglect, is now become so scarce, that sometimes several years pass without any of it being brought into Europe. In place of cotton, coffee has been cultivated: but, by a similar negligence, that is produced in no great quantity; the whole produce not exceeding 30 or 35 thousand weight; one-third of which is exported to Vera Cruz, and the rest to Madrid. The cultivation of coffee naturally leads to that of sugar; and this, which is the most valuable production of America, would be sufficient to give Cuba that state of prosperity for which it seems designed by nature. Although the surface of the island is in general uneven and mountainous, yet it has plains sufficiently extensive, and well enough watered, to supply the consumption of the greatest part of Europe with sugar. The incredible fertility of its new lands, if properly managed, would enable it to surpass every other nation, however they may now have got the start of it: yet such is the indolence of the Spaniards, that to this day they have but few plantations, where, with the finest canes, they make but a small quantity of coarse sugar at a great expence. This serves partly for the Mexican market, and partly for the mother-country; while the indolent inhabitants are content to import sugar for themselves at the expence of near 220,000*l.* annually. It has been expected, with probability, that the tobacco imported from Cuba would compensate this loss; for after furnishing Mexico and Peru, there was sufficient, with the little brought from Caracca and Buenos Ayres, to supply all Spain. But this trade too has declined through the negligence of the court of Madrid, in not gratifying the general taste for tobacco from the Havannah. The Spanish colonies have an universal trade in skins; and Cuba supplies annually about 10 or 12 thousand. The number might easily be encreased in a country abounding with wild cattle, where some gentlemen possess large tracts of ground, that for want of population can scarce be applied to any other purpose than that of breeding cattle. The hundredth part of this island is not yet cleared. The true plantations are all confined to the beautiful plains of the Havannah; and even those are not what they might be. All these plantations together may employ about 25,000 male and female slaves. The number of whites, mestees, mulattoes, and free negroes, upon the whole island, amounts to about 30,000. The food of these different species consists of excellent pork, very bad beef, and cassava bread. The colony would be more flourishing, if its productions had not been made the property of a company, whose exclusive privilege operates as a constant and invariable principle of discouragement. If any thing could supply the want of an open trade, and atone for the grievances occasioned by this monopoly at Cuba, it would be the advantage which this island has for such a long time enjoyed, in being the rendezvous of almost all the Spanish ships that sail to the new world. The island was attacked in 1741 by admiral Vernon, who did not succeed; but it was taken in 1762, by the earl of Albemarle, &c. It has many harbours and towns, which will be inserted under their proper names; and has conveniencies both for making of salt, and catching of fish, which are principally barbel and shad. It has mules, plenty of horses, sheep, wild boars, hogs, and cattle of a larger and better breed than any other part of America; wild and tame fowl, parrots, partridges with blue heads, and large tortoises. Their shores also abound with sea-fowl, particularly a sort of cranes, which are white when young, and of various colours when old. Here are quarries of flints, and fountains of bitumen, which is used in calking ships instead of pitch, as well as in medicinal compositions; and here are also some copper mines, with which they cast cannon, &c.

CUBA, or ALCUBA, a town of Alentejo, in Portugal. It lies 36 miles S. of Evora. Lat. 3, 20, N. Long. 8, 31, W.

CUBAGUA, an island of Terra Firma, from whence it is parted by a strait of 65 miles from Paria, or New Andalusia. It was discovered by Columbus in 1498. It is about 9 miles long; and its fishery produces the greatest number of pearls, but they are not of the largest size. It lies in lat. 11, 45; long. 64, 12; has but a few inhabitants, and is subject to Spain.

CUBLEY, in Derbyshire, 6 miles S. of Ashburn, with a fair on Nov. 30.

CUCKFIELD, a market-town of Sussex, 11 miles from Lewes, and 40 from London. Here are 4 annual fairs, May 25, Whitfun-Tuesday, Sept. 19, and Nov. 8.

CUCKMERE, a river in Sussex, which runs into the sea at Cuckmere-haven.

CUDELLORE, river of the Mogul empire, and East Indies, in Asia, about a mile S. of Fort St. David's, in September and October capable of containing vessels of 200-tons; and though it has a bar, the water is very smooth.

CUELLAR, anciently Colenda, a small, but ancient town of Old Castile. It stands high, and gives title of marquis to the eldest son of the Albuquerque family.

CUENCA, (city of,) anciently Conca, belonging to Sierra, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. It lies on a hill between high mountains; is the see of a bishop, suffragan to Toledo, with a yearly income of 50,000 ducats. It lies 88 miles E. of Madrid. Lat. 40, 27, N. Long. 2, 36, W.

C U

CUENCA, the capital city of a jurisdiction of the same name, in the province of Quito, in South America. It stands in a spacious plain. From 4 rivers in its neighbourhood, their streams uniting, form a considerable one. Its streets are straight, and conveniently broad. It contains 3 parishes, with convents, nunneries, and a college of Jesuits. The male inhabitants are shamefully indolent; but the women are remarkably industrious, spinning and weaving bays, &c. They entirely manage that little commerce by which their families are supported. The number of inhabitants is computed at 20 or 30,000 souls. Here the cold is very little felt, and the heat very supportable. The country is finely interspersed with farm-houses and sugar-plantations. They have corn and pasture land; and they make a good deal of cheese. Lat. 20, 53, 0. 49 S. and 29, 25, W. of Quito; from which city it is 170 miles distant.

CUJAVIA, a part of Great Poland, is fruitful, and full of inland lakes, which abound with fish; among those, that of Goplo is the most considerable, being 5 miles long, and half a mile broad. The bishop of Cujavia is a suffragan to Gnesnia, and he also styles himself prelate of Pomerellia. The bishopric was formerly called that of Kruswick, the cathedral being at the place of that name: and after it was translated to Uladislaw, it likewise kept that appellation. It comprehends the two palatinates of Brzesc and Uladislaw. The former contains the districts of Kruszwica and Kowal; the latter those of Bydgoszcz, Plockewics, Lawliszyn, Dybow, and Strzelno; in the last of which is a nunnery, said to be the richest in all Great Poland.

CUICOCHA, an inland lake of Quito, in Peru, in South America, a league in length, and half a league broad. Near its middle are two islands, abounding with a species of wild rabbits and deer, which frequently swim to the main land; but when pursued, swim back to their retreat. Here are several small fish, like cray-fish, but without a shell, and sent in pickle to Quito.

CULBETH, a river in Pembrokeshire, which falls into the Cledhewen.

CULENBURG, a town of Guelderland, 1 of the Seven United Provinces, on the river Lech, with a castle, and title of count in the Waldeck family. It lies 6 miles from Buren on the N. W. and 10 from Utrecht on the S. Lat. 51, 47 N. Long. 5, 15, E.

CULENGA, one of the principal rivers which runs into the Lena, to the W. or on the left hand, belonging to the Asiatic part of Russia.

CULIACAN, a province of Guadalaxara, in the audience or kingdom of New Galicia, in Old Mexico, or New Spain. It has the province of

Cinaloa on the N. New Biscay and the Zacatacas on the E. Chiametlan on the S. and the gulf of California on the W. Its length is 60 leagues, and breadth 50. It abounds with all sorts of fruit. When this country was first discovered by the Spaniards, they found houses here built after a strange manner, and full of serpents, hissing at such as came near. These were often worshipped by the natives, who alledged that the devil frequently appeared to them in that shape. The great river La Sal in this country is well inhabited on each side. According to Dampier, it is a salt lake, or bay, in which is good riding at anchor, though it has a narrow entrance, and runs 12 leagues E. and parallel with the shore. Here are several Spanish farms and salt-ponds about it; and 5 leagues from it are two rich mines, worked by slaves belonging to the citizens of Compostella. Here also is another great river, whose banks are full of woods and pastures. Gazman, who first discovered, or at least subdued this part of the country, called it Mugeris, or the Women's-river, as he saw a great number of women here; which gave occasion to the fable of Amazons living in this country. On this river he built a town, to which he gave the name of St. Michael.

CULLEMBACH, or CULLEMBERG, the northern subdivision of the circle of Franconia, in Germany, and subject to the king of Prussia; 5 miles from N. to S. and 35 from E. to W. It has Bamberg on the W. Bohemia on the E. Saxony on the N. and Nuremberg on the S.

This principality is partly mountainous, and in some places very sandy, but this, with good cultivation, produces various herbs and fruits. In general this country has every thing necessary for the support of man, but no wine. Here are marbles of all colours; with crystal, iron, vitriol, sulphur, antimony, copper, and lead. Its ancient gold and silver mines are gone to decay. The Fichtelberg mountain is the most remarkable; and in the district of Streithurg are some remarkable cavities. Its several rivers abound with good fish. Cullembach contains 42 towns.

Of the same name is its capital city, and situated on the Maine, 25 miles E. of Bamberg. It has a well-fortified castle, where the family-records of Brandenburg are kept. Lat 50, 26, N. Long. 11, 37, E.

CULLEN, an old royal burgh of Boyne, a district of Banffshire, in the middle division of Scotland; hence in the Highland language called Cuyllen-a-Boyne. It is one of the districts or boroughs, which alternately with Banff, Elgin, Kintore, and Inverary, sends one member to the British parliament. It has a small harbour below the town on the Murray frith, and is noted for its fruitful fruitful soil on the coast, and salmon-fishery. The other parts are mountainous, and has large quarries of spotted marble. Near one end of the town is a noble seat of the earl of Finlater and Seafield. It lies 46 miles N. W. of Aberdeen, and the same E. of Inverness.

CULLIFORD, a place in Devonshire, noted as the habitation of the famous Sir Thomas Gates, who, when bound for Virginia, of which he was governor, was, in 1609, shipwrecked and cast ashore by a violent storm, together with Sir George Somers, by which accident they became the first possessors of the island of Bermudas, or Somers's-island. Fair, March the 1st.

CULLITON, or COLLITON, a market-town of Devonshire. It has 2 annual fairs, May 1 and Nov. 30. It lies 17 miles S. E. of Exeter, and 159 W. of London.

CULLODEN, in Inverness-shire, about a mile to the S. of which was fought a battle on a moor or blair, called Drummossie, between the king's troops commanded by the duke of Cumberland, and a body of rebels, with a few French, under the young Chevalier, when the latter were routed and dispersed on April 16, 1746; and thereby an end was put to the insurrection in that kingdom. Culloden is little more than 2 miles from Inverness on the E.

CULM, or CHÉLMNO, the capital of the palatinate of the same name, or Culmerland, in Polish Prussia. It stands high on the Vistula. It is a large place, but poorly inhabited, and was formerly one of the Hanse towns, to which it was subject; but now to its bishop. Here are 2 convents for monks, and one for nuns. It has suffered much by fire: it lies 56 miles S. of Dantzick. Lat 53, 20, N. Long. 19, 20, E.

CULMOHRE, a town in the county of Londonderry, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, on Lough-foyle, 7 miles N. of Londonderry town.

CULMERLAND, or jurisdiction of Culm, a palatinate of Polish Prussia. The bishopric of Culm is the oldest among those of this country. To it belongs a collegiate church.

CULROSS, a royal burgh of Clackmananshire, in the S. of Scotland, and on the confines of Fife-shire and Perthshire. Is one of the districts or burghs of Inverkeithing, Stirling, Dunfermling, and Queen's-ferry, which by turns send a member to the British parliament. This place is noted for making of girdles, namely, round plates of iron, on which their oat-cakes are baked over the fire. It lies on the N. side of the frith of Forth, towards the head of it, and 26 miles N. W. of Edinburgh. This town is pronounced as if written Curis, and had formerly a famous abbey, and more lately two celebrated Presbyterian pastors, namely, Sir James Frazer of Bray, and his nephew, Mr. James Cuthbert.

CULUMBTON. See COLUMPTON.

CUMÆ, once a famous city, of which only ruins are now left. It lies in the Terra di Lavoro of Naples, in Lower Italy, on the top of a hill. Its waters were reckoned by the ancients to be very salubrious.

CUMÆ, anciently a large city of Æolis, in Asiatic Turkey, upon the Ægean sea. It gave name to the Cumean sybil. Now it lies in ruins.

CUMANA, or COMANA, the capital of New Andalusia, a province of Terra Firma. It sometimes gives its name to the province. The Spaniards built this city in 1520; and it is defended by a strong castle. The town stands near the mouth of a great lake, or branch of the sea, called Laguna de Carriaco; about which are several rich towns; but its mouth is so shallow, that no ships of burden can enter it. It has but few inhabitants and little trade. The privateers were once repulsed at Cumana, without daring to attempt it any more, being the only place in the North-seas they had in vain attempted. It is situated 3 leagues S. of the North-sea, and to the S. W. of Margarettasland. Lat. 9, 55. Long. 65, 3.

CUMANAGATE, a small town in a bay on the coast of Terra-Firma, in the West-Indies, in the province of Cumana, or Andalusia. It is situated on a low, flat shore, which abounds with oysters that produce pearls.

CUMANIA, (Great) a county of the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It is united with the county of Heves; but has its own governor.

CUMANIA, (Little) a county of the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Both Great and Little take their name from the Cumani, a people who came from that country at present possessed by the Precop Tartars, between the Dnieper and Black Sea, from which they were expelled by the Tartars in 1237, and came under their king, Cullen, to Hungary, where they were favourably received by Bela IV. who styled himself king of Cumania.

CUMBERLAND, (Island of,) in Georgia, in North America, is about 20 miles S. of the town of Frederica. On it are the 2 forts called William and St. Andrews. The former, which is at its S. end, and commands the inlet of Amelia-sound, is strongly pallisadoed, and defended by 8 pieces of cannon. Barracks are built here for 220 men, besides store-houses. Within the pallisadoes are fine springs of water, and a timber-house, with large magazines magazines under it for ammunition and provisions.

CUMBERLAND-HARBOUR, in the S. E. part of the island of Cuba, one of the great Antilles, in America; was formerly called Waltheam. But admiral Vernon and general Wentworth, who arrived here with a squadron in July 1741, made an encampment on shore, where they built a fort, giving it the present name, in honour of the duke of Cumberland. It is one of the finest harbours in the West-Indies, capable of sheltering any number of ships from hurricanes: it lies in a wholesome country, abounding with cattle and provisions, and a fine fresh-water river, which the admiral called Augusta, and is navigable for several leagues. This harbour is about 20 leagues E. from St. Jago de Cuba, with thick woods mostly all the way to it. Here the English forces having staid till almost the end of November following, were, by reason of the sickness among them, extremely diminished, and being obliged to quit the island, were carried back to Jamaica. Lat. 20, 30, N. Long. 76, 50, W.

CUMBERLAND, a county of England, 75 miles in length, and 27 in breadth, and is bounded on the N. by Scotland and part of Northumberland, on the W. by the Irish sea, on the S. by Lancashire, and on the E. by Westmoreland, Durham, and Northumberland. It contains a city, 14 market-towns, 58 parishes, and sends 6 members to parliament. The air is sharp and cold and the land for the most part hilly. It yields plenty of fish, flesh, and fowls, with abundance of large salmon. The principal mountain is, the Skiddow, which is very high, from whence run a ridge of mountains, called the Fells, to the most northern part of the country; it is watered by several rivers, besides lakes and meers.

The mountains feed large flocks of sheep, whose flesh is particularly sweet and good, and the valleys produce corn, &c. This county is generally admired for the pleasant prospects it affords; but these would be more beautiful, could trees be brought to thrive here better than they generally do. The principal commodities produced by this county are coal, lead, copper, lapis calaminaris, black lead, (a mineral almost peculiar to this county, which contains more than sufficient to supply all Europe;) wild-fowl, salmon, pearls, &c. The last are found in muscles at the mouth of a brook called the Irt, which discharges itself into the sea a little to the N. of Ravinglafs.

This country abounds with rivers and marshes called by the inhabitants meers; of the former the Eden takes its rise from Ulles Water, and after a course of about 30 miles to the N. turns to the W.

and falls into Solway frith. This river is remarkable for a small delicious fish, called char. The Derwent runs through the middle of the country, and discharges itself into the Irish sea. This river abounds with salmon.

CUMBERLAND-BAY, in the most northern countries of America. Its mouth lies under the polar circle, and runs to the N. W. and it is thought to communicate with Baffin's-bay on the N. In the cod of Cumberland-bay are several small islands, called Cumberland islands. None but the English, as Martiniere observes, call that bay Cumberland-bay; and De Lisle does not mention it.

CUMBERLAND, (county,) in West Jersey, has the Delaware-bay on the S. and W. of the country, and Greenwich is the county-town.

CUMBERLAND, a county of Massachusetts-bay, formerly the territory Sagodock.

CUMBERLAND, a county in Pennsylvania, the largest and the most western in the whole province, and is very mountainous.

CUMBERLAND, a town in New Kent county, Virginia, on Pamunky-river, 17 miles S. E. of Newcastle, 11 W. of Delawar, and 26 N. W. from Williamsburgh.

CUMBERLAND-ISLAND, one of the new-discovered isles by Capt. Wallis, in the South Sea, in 1767, but he did not land on it.

CUMBRA, (Great and Small,) 2 isles near that of Bute, in the W. of Scotland. The first is a mile in length, with salubrious waters; and is said to be fruitful in grain; but the smaller isle is waste, yet abounding with deer.

CUMRI, CIMBRI, or UMERI, seem all of the same original, say our antiquarians. The Umbri were looked upon as the most-ancient inhabitants of Italy, being settled in one of the finest parts of the whole country, and extending themselves from the Adriatic to the Tyrrhenian sea, or from the gulph of Venice to that of Genoa.

CUNAXA, in the province of Babylon, famous for the battle fought in the plains thereof between Cyrus the younger, brother of Artaxerxes, (Arfaces) king of Persia, and him the said king Artaxerxes, wherein this Cyrus was overcome and slain. This happened in the year of the world 3905, of the flood 2598, before Christ 401.

CUNCAN, the 2d province in the county of Decan, in the peninsula of India within the Ganges. It is also called Visiapour.

CUNIO. See CONE.

CUNNINGHAM, one of the 3 subdivisions or bailiwicks of the shire of Air, in the S. of Scotland. It takes its name, which in Saxon denotes the king's residence, from its beautiful situation. It has Kyle on the S. from which the river Irwin divides; divides it; the mouth of Clyde on the N. the frith of Clyde on the W. with Renfrew and part of Clydesdale on the E. Its greatest length from N. W. to S. E. is about 29 miles, and greatest breadth from E. to W. 12. It is not so mountainous as Kyle, and gives name to the earl of Glencairn.

CUNVIL, a river in Merionethshire, which falls into the Valenryd below Maynturog.

CUR, or CYRUS, a river of Asia; which rising in Mount Caucasus, runs S. through Georgia and Chirvan, in Persia, and joins the Arras or Araxes; after continuing its course eastwards, it discharges itself into the Caspian sea.

CURACOA, or CURRASSOW, one of the larger Antilles islands, subject to the Dutch, situated in W. Long. 68, 30. N. Lat. 12, 30. This island is little else than a bare rock, about 10 leagues long and 5 broad, lying 3 leagues off the coast of Venezuela. It has an excellent harbour, but the entrance is difficult. The basin is extremely large, and convenient in every respect; and is defended by a fort skilfully constructed, and always kept in repair. The reason of forming a settlement upon this barren spot, was to carry on a contraband trade with the Spanish colonies on the continent; but after some time the method of managing this trade was changed.

Curassow itself became an immense magazine, to which the Spaniards resorted in their boats, to exchange gold, silver, vanilla, cocoa, cochineal, bark, skins and mules, for negroes, linen, silks, Indian stuffs, spices, laces, ribbands, quick-silver, steel, and iron-ware. These voyages though continual did not prevent a number of Dutch sloops from passing from Curassow to the continent. But the modern substitution of register-ships, instead of galleons, has made this communication less frequent; but it will be revived, whenever, by the intervention of war, the communication with the Spanish main shall be cut off. The disputes between the courts of London and Versailles also prove favourable to the trade of Curassow. At these times it furnishes provisions to the southern parts of St. Domingo, and takes off all its produce. Even the French privateers, from the Windward islands, repair in great numbers to Curassow, notwithstanding the distance. The reason is, that they find there all kinds of necessary stores for their vessels; and frequently Spanish, but always European goods, which are universally used. English privateers seldom cruise in these parts. Every commodity without exception, that is landed at Curassow, pays one per cent. port-duty. Dutch goods are never taxed higher; but those that are shipped from other European ports, pay 9 per cent. more. Foreign coffee is subject to the same tax, in order to promote the sale of that at Surinam. Every other production of America is subject only to a payment of 3 per cent. but with an express stipulation that they are to be conveyed directly to some port belonging to the republic.

CURDISTAN, the modern name of Assyria. The inhabitants are called Kurds or Curdees. This is a large country, lying partly in Persia, being bounded on the N. by Turcomania or Armenia, and on the S. by Eyraca Arabia, or Chaldea.

CURIA-MARIA an island of Asia, on the coast of Arabia the Happy, over against the mouth of the river Prim. Long. 35, 25, E. Lat. 77, 0, N.

CURISCHE-NERUNG, or peninsula of Courland, in Latin, Peninsula Couronenfis, a narrow sandy waste, and barren strip of land, in the kingdom of Prussia. It begins near the village of Krantzkrug, and ends at Memel, dividing the Baltic sea and Curische-haff or Courland harbour; it is 14 miles long, and a quarter of a mile, and in some parts upwards, in breadth. The storms of wind occasion great devastations here, gathering the sand into huge heaps; so that the poor inhabitants are often obliged to shift their habitations; pines are thrown down, the timber of which is strewed here and there, and rots upon the ground. In general, on the side towards the Baltic, most of the trees are partly half decayed, and many quite so, and stand in the ground like so many dead poles. In this forest are deer and falcons. In the Curische-haff are several haas, as they are called, or promontories, which stretch out, and are very dangerous, by reason of their clayish and stony bottom. Upon it are several villages, but small and poor; near one of these, called Pilkoppen, is a high mountain where the Prussian idol Pilkob was worshipped. All the villages here support themselves by the fishery, and have very few cattle. The Courland haven abovementioned, is a fresh-water lake, which opening to the Baltic, forms a convenient port defended by a strong castle, which has suffered much by war and fire. In 1698 a bloody action happened near this place, between the families of Sapieha de Grodek and Oginski, in which the latter were defeated.

CURREY-RIVAL, a village in Somersetshire, a mile W. of Langport, which hath a fair on Monday after August 1, for cattle and sheep.

CURRITUCK, a sea-port town in N. Carolina, in the county of Currituck, at which place is a custom-house, with a collector. It stands on an island, and has an inlet and sound of the same name a little S. of it.

CURSOLIERS, a small island of Greece, in the gulph of Patras, formerly called Echanades; there are but few inhabitants.

CURUCHE, a town of Alentejo, in Portugal.

C U

It contains 2400 inhabitants, with a district of 4 parishes.

CURZULA. See CORZOLA.

CUSCO, an ancient city of the audience of Lima, in Peru, in S. America. It was the seat and capital of the E. empire of the Yncas, and of the same date with it. The situation of this city is very uneven, being on the sides of mountains. To the N. of the city are the ruins of the famous fort of the Yncas, standing upon a mountain, which was intended to have been inclosed within a wall of prodigious large stones, and thus rendered inaccessible to an enemy. This fortress is now in ruins, only the outward wall stands. The N. and W. sides of Cusco are surrounded by mountains; and on the S. is a plain, with very beautiful walks. Most of the houses are of stone, well-contrived, and tiled. The mouldings of all the doors are gilt, the apartments being spacious and elegantly decorated. It is the see of a bishop, and, besides the cathedral, contains 8 other parish-churches. The principal walls of the Dominican convent here were what belonged to the temple of the Sun, in which was a golden image of that planet; the inside walls and ceilings of this structure, together with those of the emperor's palace, being covered with gold, when Pizarro first took this city. Besides this are several other convents and nunneries, with a college, &c. In the diocese of Cusco are 14 jurisdictions. Cusco is still an elegant city, nearly equal to that of Lima, E. of which it lies about 356 miles. The number of its inhabitants are said to amount to between 3 and 4000 Spaniards, and 12000 Indians. They carry on here a woollen manufacture, as well as some of cotton, and work largely in leather, particularly in gilding it for hanging rooms; and a great many are employed in making with wood or ivory pieces of inlaid work and sculpture, and in drawing figures on the marble that is found at Cuccua. Lat. 12. 25, S. Long. 73. 40, E.

CUSH, (the land of.) According to the Jews, when taken for a country, in scripture, is always to be understood of the Proper Ethiopia.

CUSSET, a town of Lower Auvergne, in France; it is the seat of a royal bailiwick and prevoité, with a chapter and abbey.

CUSTRIN, the capital of the New Mark of Brandenburg on the Oder, and by its situation and fortifications is very strong. It is small, but has large suburbs, and there is no approaching it but on causeways raised on arches. In 1758, it held out against the Russian army, who reduced both the town and suburbs to a heap of rubbish except the walls, by their bombs and red-hot bullets.

CUTCHNAGGEN, in the kingdom of Cambaya or Guzuratte, East-Indies, is the first town S.

of the river Indus, which separates it from Sindy or Tatta province, and is with its province of the same name, governed by a queen, who is very formidable to the neighbouring states; and the inhabitants always elect a female for their governess, because that sex will be so complaisant as to take advice of the council, whereas men in power grow insolent and obstinate. It is a town of some trade, the country producing corn, cotton, and chank, a shell-fish in shape of a periwinkle, almost as big as a man's arm. In Bengal, &c. it is sawed into bracelets for women.

CUTHA, mentioned 2 Kings xvii. 24. is supposed to be the same land with Cush, viz. not the African or Ethiopian, but the Asiatic Cush, which is said by Moses to be encompassed by the river Gihon, and that, accordingly, it is much the same with the country by the Greeks called Susiana, where we read of the Cossi, Cissi, &c. and to this very day is said to be called Chufestan.

CUTHEANS. In 2 Kings, xvii. we read that the king of Assyria carrying away Israel captive, brought men from Babylon, and from Cutha, &c. to re-people the land of Israel; from whence these new inhabitants came to be called Cutheans. The text adds, (ver. 25, &c.) that these new colonies were like to have been destroyed by lions; (Josephus says by pestilence,) upon their very first settlement, for their disregard to God, so that they were forced to send into Assyria, to desire the king to send them some Israelitish priests to instruct them how to worship and appease him.

CUYO-ISLANDS, among the Philippines, E. Indies. They are 5, not far from one another, beyond the Calamianes, in sight of the high mountain of Mindoro. Their mountains abound in all sorts of beast and fowl, and the plains produce rice, fruit, &c.

CUZUMEL, an island in the province of Yucatan, and audience of Mexico, in S. America, in the bay of Honduras, 15 leagues long and 5 broad. The adventurers who used to touch here, when they went upon discoveries from the isle of Cuba, called it Santa Cruz, from its chief town. It lies 4 leagues to the E. of the lake of Bacalar, in Lat. 19. Long. 87.

CYANEUS, a river in Colchis.

CYCLADES, islands in the Archipelago, and European Turkey; anciently so called, as lying in a circular form, of which that of Delos is the centre. They are situated between Candia on the S. and Negropont on the N. or between Europe and Asia. They at length included the isles called Sporades, i. e. strewed up and down, and contributed to the revenues of the temple at Delos.

CYCLADES-ISLES, or GREAT CYCLADES, an Archipelago of above 10 islands, in the South Seas, Seas, W. of Oitheita, discovered by Capt. Cook, in 1774, situate in Lat. 18, 30, S. Long. 170, W. There are several volcanos on these islands, yet are well inhabited by native Indians.

CYCLOPS, three rocks thus called, situated between Catania and the river Acis on the coast of Sicily. They are formed from the lava of Mount Ætna, and are taken notice of by Pliny, who calls them by this name.

CYDONIA, a city of Crete, founded by the Samians; stood, according to Strabo, Pliny, and Diodorus, on the coast opposite to the Lacedemonian territory in Peloponnesus, and was the strongest, and most powerful, and wealthy city of all Crete; since, in the civil wars of that island, it withstood the united forces of Gnoſſus and Gortyna, after they had reduced the greatest part of the island. It had never been taken till the time of Metellus, it opening its gates to him after the defeat of Lathenes and Panares. It was also the most ancient, most of the other cities having been built and peopled by Cydonian colonies, and was therefore by the Greeks called the mother of cities. From it was the quince-tree first brought into Italy, and thence the fruit by the Latins, called Malum Cydonium, or Cydonian apple. This city is said to be the present CANEA.

CYDNUS, a river of Cilicia in Asia Minor.

CYLLENE, (Mount,) in Arcadia, had its name from Cyllen the son of Elatus. This is the mount on which Jupiter is said to have begot Mercury on Maja the daughter of Atlas.

CYLLOMA, a jurisdiction of Arequipa diocese, and audience of Lima, in Peru, in S. America. It begins at about 30 leagues E. of Arequipa city, and is famous for a mountain of the same name, containing very rich silver mines, which, though constantly worked, the produce is still considerable. The cold in the greatest part of the country is very intense; so that the declivities of mountains and vallies yield but little. In some parts are wild asses.

CYNOCEPHALUS, a place in ancient Thessaly, where, in the year before Christ 197, a battle was fought by Philip king of Macedon, and the Romans, in which the former was overthrown.

CYNTHUS, (Mount,) in the island Delos, and said to be so high, as to cover the whole island with its shadow; but modern travellers speak of it as of moderate height.

CYPRUS, an island situated in the Levant, or most easterly part of the Mediterranean sea, between 33 and 36 degrees of E. long. and 30 and 34 of N. lat. In ancient times this island was known by the names of Acamis, Ceraſtis, Aspalia, Amathus, Macaria, Cryptos, Colina, Sphicia, Paphia, Salamina, Æroſa, and Cyprus. The etymologies of these names are neither very easily found, nor are they of much importance. The name by which it was most generally known is that of Cyprus, said to be derived from Cypros the name of a shrub with which the island abounded; but what kind of shrub that was, is still disputed.

Cyprus, according to Eratosthenes, was first discovered by the Phœnicians, 2 or 3 generations before the days of Asterius and Minos, kings of Crete; according to Sir Isaac Newton's computation, 2006 years before the Christian Æra. It was at that time so full of wood that it could not be tilled, and the Phœnicians first cut-down that wood for melting copper, with which the island abounded; and afterwards when they began to sail without fear on the Mediterranean, that is, after the Trojan war, they built great navies of the wood produced on the island.

Josephus, however, informs us, that the descendants of Cittim, the son of Javan, and grandson of Japhat, were the original inhabitants of Cyprus. According to his account, Cittim, seeing his brother Tarshish settled in Cilicia where he built the city of Tarsus, settled with his followers in this opposite island; and either he or his descendants laid the foundations of the city of Citiium, which, according to Ptolemy was the most ancient in the island. As Cyprus was too narrow to contain the great numbers who attended him, he left here as many as might serve to people the country, and with the rest passed over into Macedon.

The island of Cyprus was divided among several petty kings till the time of Cyrus the Great. He subdued them all; but left each in possession of his kingdom, obliging them only to pay him an annual tribute, and to send supplies of men, money, and ships when required. The Cyprian princes lived thus subject to the Persians till the reign of Darius Hystaspes, when they attempted to shake off the yoke, but with bad success, their forces being entirely defeated, and themselves again obliged to submit. They made another more successful attempt about the year before Christ 357; but, however, could never totally free themselves from their subjection. It is very probable that they submitted to Alexander the Great, though historians are silent as to that event.

On the death of the Macedonian conqueror, the dominion of Cyprus was disputed by Antigonius, and Ptolemy the son of Lagus. At last Antigonius prevailed, and the whole island submitted to him about 304 years before Christ. He and his son Demetrius kept possession of it for 11 years, when it was recovered by Ptolemy, and quietly possessed by him and his descendants, till 58 years before Christ, when it was most unjustly seized by the Romans. In the time of Augustus, it began to be be ranked among the pro-consular provinces, and to be governed by magistrates sent thither by the senate. In the year 648, it was conquered by the Saracens; but recovered by the Romans in 957. They held it, however, but for a short time, and the barbarians kept possession of it till the commencement of the croisades. It was then reduced by the croisaders; and Richard I. of England gave it to the princes of the Lusignan family, who held it till the year 1570. They divided it into 12 provinces, in each of which was a capital city, from which the province was denominated. So considerable was the island at this time, that besides the cities of above-mentioned; and others of less note, it contained 800 villages. In 1570, it was taken by the Turks, and though it hath ever since continued under their tyrannical yoke, it is still so considerable as to be governed by a beglerbeg, and 7 sangiacs under him.

The air in this island is for the most part very unwholesome, on account of the many fens and marshes with which the country abounds. The soil is an excellent fertile clay; and would produce all the necessaries of life in abundance, if properly cultivated. There are no rivers in the country, but that defect is supplied by abundance of springs. By reason of the uncultivated state of the country, they are also greatly infested with poisonous reptiles of various kinds. The people are extremely ignorant and lascivious, as indeed they are remarked to have been from the remotest antiquity. Anciently the worship of Venus was established in this island, whence her title among the poets of the Cyprian queen; and such an inclination had the inhabitants to become the votaries of this goddess, both in theory and practice, that the young women used to prostitute themselves in her temple in order to raise themselves portions. Nor are their successors said to be much better at this day. The exports of the island are silks, wool, umber, and wine; the imports are French and Venetian broad-cloths; and sometimes a few bales of English manufacture, cutlery wares, sugar, tin, lead, &c.

The Knights of Cyprus, is an order instituted by Guy de Lusignan, titular king of Jerusalem, to whom Richard I. of England, after conquering this island, made over his right.

CYRENAICA. See BAREA.

CYROPOLIS, a large, and for a while, famous city of Media Atropatia, between Artaxata and the Portæ Caucasæ, 200 miles from the former, and 120 from the latter.

CYRRAH, the sea-port of Delphos, in the bay of Corinth.

CYRRAH, in Crete. See HYERAPYTNA.

CYRRHESTICA, a province of Syria on the Euphrates.

CYRRHUS, or Cyprus, capital of the foregoing part of Syria.

CYRUS, or CYRNUS, a river of Albania, is now called the Kur, and springs from the Moschian mountains, which separate Colchis from Armenia, waters the country now called Mogan, receives into its channel the Aragus and the Araxes, and falls into the Caspian sea, within but a sm all distance from the S. borders of ancient Albania. The ancients gave it some 12, others 40 mouths; but Pliny and all our modern travellers allow it but one.

CYTHARON, a mountain of Phocis, included in the modern Livadia a province of European Turkey. It was consecrated to the Muses, and consequently highly extolled by the ancient poets.

CYTHERA. See CERIGO.

CYTHNUS, about 12 miles E. of Ceos, is counted by Strabo among the most fruitful islands of the Ægean Sea. Here was born Cyadiaz, a most eminent painter. The cheese of this island was, according to Stephanus and Julius Pollux, in great request amongst the ancients. This island is now called Thermia, from the Greek word Thermos, signifying hot, by reason it abounded with hot springs, which were much commended by the ancients. There are remains of a very ancient and magnificent city on the S. coast.

CYZICUM, anciently Dindymis, situated at the foot of the mountain of the latter name, in Mysia and Phrygia the Less, a province of Asiatic Turkey. It was famous for a stately temple dedicated to the goddess Cybele. This was a very strong place, with a noble castle, high walls, and marble towers, as appears from its sustaining a long siege against Mithridates. It had a commodious harbour, and called Little Troy by the Greeks. It was first ruined by an earthquake, and is now but an ordinary town, on the S. E. coast of the Propontis, or sea of Marmora, about 80 miles almost W. of Bursa. Lat. 40, 26, N. Long. 27, 36, E.

CZACKATHURN, a town of Stiria, in the circle of Austria, in Germany, near the confluence of the rivers Muer and Save, 56 miles N. E. of Gratz. Lat. 46, 59, N. Long. 17, 20, E.

CZALAW, a city in the circle of the same name, and eastern division of Bohemia, in Germany, on the river Crudemka. It is noted for the burial of Ziska, the famous Hussite general, whose ashes the Imperialists dug up and scattered in the air: also for a battle fought in 1742; between the Prussians and Austrians, in which both claimed the victory, though the latter lost the field; 36 miles S. E. of Prague. Lat. 49, 56, N. Long. 15, 21, E.

CZASZNIKI, a small town in the palatinate of of Polokie, and great duchy of Lithuania, memorable for a defeat of the Russians in 1567 near it.

CZENSTOCHOWA, a town of Little Poland, on the Warta, particularly remarkable for a convent of St. Paul the hermit, on Klarenberg, in its neighbourhood, where is an image of the Virgin Mary, said to have been painted by St. Luke, to which there is a great resort of pilgrims; and it is reckoned the Loretto of Poland, on account of its plate, jewels, and rich vessels. The convent is fortified, and has a garrison. In 1655 the Swedes attempted it without success. Near this place a battle was fought in 1665, between the royal troops and those of Lubomirski, to the disadvantage of the former. In 1670, king Michael was married here to Eleonora, the emperor Leopold's sister: this place is famous for its beer. Lat. 51, 25, N. Long. 18, 51, E.

CZERCASSI, a town of Russian Ukrain, on the river Dnieper, 96 miles S. E. of Kiow. Lat. 49, 30, N. Long. 32, 22, E.

There is another town of this name in the palatinate of Kiown, in Little Poland, in which is a castle.

CZERMISSÉ, or SCHEREMISSE, (province of,) in western Muscovy. It is a vast tract on the E. side of Mordova, extending from Lat. 54, to 61, N. and divided by the river Wolga into two parts; namely, the southern, which is full of mountains; and the northern, being flat and pasture land; and these are bounded to the E. by Casan. The inhabitants are reckoned the wildest of all the Tartars.

CZERNIGOF, the principal place of a province of the same name in Russia, on the confines of Poland, 96 miles N. E. of Kiow. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 32, 20, N.

CZERNICHOW, one of the circles of Kiow government, in Russia, formerly a duchy, and ceded to the Russians by the Poles at the treaty of Andrussow. It is bounded on the N. and E. by Severia and part of Lithuania, on the W. and S. by the Dnieper, and palatinate of Kiow. The river Desna runs through it from E. to W. It extends from lat. 51, to 53, N. and where broadest towards the S. is about 30 leagues; but it decreases northwards to a point. The chief town is of the same name, on the river of Desna, and the see of an archbishop, who is also metropolitan of Novogorod Sewerski: though small, it is well-built, and stands in Lat. 22, 25, N.

CZERSK, a palatinate of Little Poland, or Masovia Proper, containing 10 districts; namely, Czerfk, Warfzawa, Wizna, Wyzogrod, Zakroczim, Ciechanow, Nur, Lomza, Roslan, and Liw. To Warscha belong the districts of the Plonsk and Tarczyn; to Liw that of Pultusk; and to the territory of Lomza, the districts of Ostroleka, Kolno, and Zambro.

CZERSK, or CZERKOW, a fine town of the palatinate of the same name above-mentioned. It lies on the Vistula, is the seat of a provincial court, and near the confines of Great Poland. It lies 36 miles S. of Warsaw. Lat. 52, 26, N. Long. 21, 36, E.

CZIGLED, a pretty spacious town of the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands in a fruitful country, and belongs to the nuns of St. Clara, in Buda. After the battle of Sicambria, this was the first place the Transylvanian Zekler or Sicilians settled in.

CZIRNITZ, or ZIRKNITZ, in Lower Carniola, Austria, is a town of about 300 houses, 20 miles S. E. of Laubach, E. Long. 32. Lat. 49. 12. chiefly noted on account of its lake, from hence called Czirnitzirsee. It is 16 miles long and 8 broad, encompassed with mountains and forests at some distance, and on the E. side with a forest of pear-trees. The water every year in June, sinks under-ground through many large holes in the bottom, leaving it quite dry till September, when it returns, spouting out of those holes with such violence that it soon rises to the height of 9 feet, and covers all the ground again, making that a sea which was before fields of corn, and pasture; for after the retreat of the water the people sow corn there, which ripens before September; and the grass grows here so quick, that it affords pasture for cattle and deer, that are turned into it from the neighbouring hills and forests, which are taken off before the springs rise again. Carp, eels, tench, &c. abound in it, but none must catch any without licence from the prince of Eckenburg, lord of the manor, till the water retires, and then the peasants take great numbers by laying nets over the holes. The lake constantly observes this course; a strange phenomenon of nature!

CZONGRODT, a town of Upper Hungary on the Theiss. It lies 30 miles N. of Segedin. Lat. 46, 10, N. Long. 10, 49, E.

DABAL, a town of Asia, in the East Indies, on the coast of Malabar, and to the S. of the gulf of Cambaye, on a navigable river. It was formerly very flourishing, but is now much decayed. It belongs to the Portuguese, and its trade consists principally in pepper and salt. E. long. 73, 55. N. Lat. 17, 30.

DABOCUNDA, a considerable town on the river Gambia and Negroland, in Africa, divided into 2 distinct towns; the one fortified with Ciboa trees fixed in the ground, and clay stuffed in between; the other is only surrounded with a cane-cirque, or hurdles fastened up with sticks. They have a king of their own, and are a very rebellious people, who in time of peace, live in open towns, but when at war, they fly to that part of them which is fortified.

DACCA, a town of Asia, in the kingdom of Bengal in the E. Indies, situated in E. long. 89, 10. N. lat. 24, 0. The advantages of the situation of this place, and the fertility of the soil round it, have long since made it the centre of an extensive commerce. The courts of Delhi and Muxadavad are furnished from thence with the cottons for their own consumption. They each of them maintain an agent on the spot to superintend the manufacture of them; and he has an authority, independent of the magistrate, over the brokers, weavers, embroiderers, and all the workmen whose business has any relation to the object of his commission.

Opposite to this city, about 150 yards W. S. W. of our factory, on a small island, there is a large piece of ordnance, with 2 stone-balls, which from their size, are supposed to belong to the cannon. It is of a very uncommon construction, and has lain in the same place time immemorial, the oldest person living here not being able to give the least intimation whence it came, or by whom it was brought. It is certainly as old as the first invention of cannon; for though at first sight, you would suppose it was cast, yet on looking into the mouth or chamber, it plainly appears to be bars hooped together. A cannon in the tower of London, made after the same manner, is preserved as a curiosity, but it is not near so well put together as that in this neighbourhood.

Dacca has been a magnificent city, according to the Moorish or Mahometan taste, if a judgment may be formed from the many mosques that yet remain, whereof some are large, and appear to have had great pains taken to make them elegant; but most of them are gone to decay. Here are also the ruins of a superb building, which was formerly the palace of Shaw Jehangere, who, Dow says, in his third volume of the History of Indostan, marched to Dacca in 1624. There were formerly many very large and lofty gates to the city; 6 or 7 of the gateways yet remain, but they also are in a ruinous state; and a very short distance from the city, there appear several very lofty bridges, of single arches, but nobody here can tell when they were built, or on what occasion; nor is there the smallest vestige remaining of any road that leads to either side of them.

DACHAW, a town of Bavaria, in Germany. It lies on the Amber, 10 miles N. W. of Munich. Lat. 48, 32, N. Long. 11, 36, E.

DACHESTAN, a town of Lower Alsace, in the bishopric of Strasburg, with a palace belonging to the bishop of Strasburg. It was taken by the Swedes in 1633. Long. 7, 45, E. Lat. 48, 35, N.

DACIA, the ancient appellation of Transylvania, Walachia, and other adjacent countries.

DADIVAN, a plain of Asia, in Persia, and in Faristan, about 12 miles in circumference. It is covered with orange, citron, and pomegranate-trees. It is between the towns of Shiras and Lar, and sometimes the Europeans from Gombroon come to take their pleasure here, in the hot season of the year.

DAFFAR. See TEHAMAH.

DAGENHAM, near Rumford in Essex, noted for the breach made by the river Thames, which laid 50,000 acres of land under water: but after ten years years inundation, and several unsuccessful attempts, it was at last effectually drained by the well-known captain Perry, whom the czar Peter of Muscovy had employed in his works for a canal at Veronitz, on the river Don. A second breach was made here in 1765, which laid 5000 acres under water; but after the works were several times blown up, was at last stopped, and the banks secured. But within the bank there is a piece of water left very deep, of several acres, which is resorted to for fishing.

DAGEROTH, in the island of Dagho, in the duchies of Livonia and Esthonia, belonging to European Russia, where is a light-house or pharos for sea-faring people.

DAGESTAN, a county of Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey. It is bounded on the E. by the Caspian sea; on the W. by Mount Caucasus; on the N. by Circassia, from which it is parted by the river Bustro; and on the S. by Shirwan, belonging to Persia. It is a large tract, full of mountains on the N. W. of the Caspian sea, and on the confines of Muscovy. The emperor of Persia is not such an absolute master of this country, but the inhabitants often revolt, being reckoned the fiercest and most barbarous people of the East, and the descendants of the ancient Parthians; so that he is obliged to wink at these disorders, by reason of the inaccessibility of their country, and to prevent their submitting to Muscovy or Turkey. When Kouli Kan of Persia attacked them, they called in the assistance of the Russians: by some underhand support from whom, and by a vigorous defence for themselves, they obliged Kouli Kan to retire, after he had lost the greatest part of his army. Their principal towns are Tarkie (Tarchu) and Derbent; but the inhabitants generally live in tents, and lead a migratory life. From among themselves they choose a chief over the rest, who is called Skemkal: and this is done by their priests throwing a golden ball at random among them, standing round in a ring; when the first who touches it with his finger is chosen to that dignity.

DAGHO, an island in the Baltic, on the coast of Livonia, pretty fruitful and triangular, each side being about 5 miles long, or the whole island is near 9 miles long, and 6 broad, and subject to Russia. Lat. 58, 52, N. Long. 21, 36, E.

DAGNO, a town of Turkey in Europe, in I-bania, with a bishop's see. It is the capital of the district of Ducagini, and is seated on the rivers Drino and Nero, near their confluence. It is 15 miles S. E. of Scutari, and 15 N. E. of Alessio. Long. 19, 48, E. Lat. 42, 0, N.

DALACA, the most considerable island on the Abex-coast, in Africa, being about 20 leagues in circuit, healthy, and well peopled, yielding excellent pasture, and is supplied with grain from the continent, about 20 leagues E. from land. Catching of fish, and the pearl-fishery, is the main branch of the inhabitants' living; and the rest follow the piratical trade, plundering all indiscriminately, particularly the Turks.

DAHOMÉ, or DAHOMY, a country on the coast of Guinea, in Africa, whose king, in 1724, conquered Ardra and Widah, or Fida, by which means the Negro trade of the Europeans was much interrupted. It lies N. of the Slave Coast, extending a vast way inland.

DAIN, one of the principal rivers of the Franche-comté, a government of France.

DALABORG, or DALEBURGH, formerly a castle and fortress of Westgothish Daland, in Sweden, and the principal place in that province, but was taken in 1434, and dismantled; on the W. side of the Wener-lake. It lies 56 miles N. E. of Gottenburg. Lat. 59, 20, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

DALE, a fine tract in Yorkshire, from a river of the same name, reaching from the city of York, about 20 miles, and all the way interspersed with seats at a small distance from one another. Many pleasant vallies between the hills of Westmoreland, towards Kendale, are by the country people called the Dales.

DALECARLIA, or Swedish THAL-LAND, a province of Sweden Proper, so called from the many valleys in it; bounded by the mountains of Norway called Daarfield on the W. and N. Hel-singia and Gestricia on the E. and Westmania with Wermeland on the S. It is above 165 miles long, and 100 in its greatest breadth, and all over mountainous, without the necessary corn-land, particularly beyond Falun; yet notwithstanding, the soil between the mountains may be used, and sown with oats and pulse for bread. The country is almost in general intersected with mountains, valleys, forests, heaths, lakes, and streams. Here are mines of silver, copper, iron, with quarries of mill-stones, &c. Likewise fine pastures. The Dal-Elbe, or Dalecarlia river, which rises in the mountains of Norway, consists of 2 streams, which run through the country, and unite at Gagnef. The one on the E. is called Oester Dal-Elfwe, and the country Ost Thal-land; and that on the W. Waster Dal-Elfwe, and the country West Thal-land. The united stream falls at length into the Bothnic gulph in the Baltic, near Elf-karleby, between Oplandia and Gestricia. The Dalecarlians, i. e. the Dale-carls, or inhabitants of the valleys, are famed in history for their uprightness and fidelity to their king and country; but especially for their valour. Among these Gustavus Vasa retired, after escaping out of a prison in Denmark,

D A

Denmark, and encouraging the people to rise in arms, they at length shook off the yoke of the Danish tyranny, which Christiern II. had carried to the utmost excess. They are extremely parsimonious and laborious. The country is divided into 6 parts; namely, 4 in the E. as Nafgards-lehn, Stahrs-lehn, Kopparbergs-lehn, and the Eastern-valleys; also 2 to the W.

DALEM, a town of the United Provinces, and capital of a district of the same name. It was taken by the French in 1672, who demolished the fortifications. It is seated on the river Barvine, 5 miles N. E. of Liege. Long. 5, 59, E. Lat. 50, 40, N.

DALIA, or DALAND, a province of West-Gothland, in Sweden; bounded by the Dalecarlia on the N. Warmeland and the Wener-lake on the E. Gothland on the S. and Bohusia with Norway on the W. It is 70 miles long, and 40 broad. Here are abundance of mountains and stones. Among the former, Borekul is the highest. It is well supplied with forests; the valleys and level tracts between the mountains are fruitful, and yield the inhabitants sufficiency of corn. They support themselves also by breeding of cattle, sheep, fisheries, weaving, and all such trades as belong to minery. They also carry on a traffic with masts, beams, boards, planks, tar, horses, oxen, sheep, tallow, butter, cheese, &c. Among its inland lakes, that of Stora-led is the most remarkable, being very long and narrow. It is divided into the N. or stony part, and into the S. or level part.

DALKEITH, a pretty large market-town of Mid-Lothian, in the S. of Scotland, at the confluence of the two rivers of North and South Esk; it is better built than many royal boroughs, and is the seat of a presbytery, containing 10 parishes. Here is a grand palace of the duke of Buccleugh's, with a fine park, canals, water-works, &c. To the town of Dalkeith large quantities of provisions are brought from the southern parts, sold here, and afterwards sent to Edinburgh, in the neighbourhood of which city it lies, a little way to the S. E.

DALMATIA, or DELMATIA, so called from its ancient capital Delmum or Delminium. It is a part of Hungarian Illyria, and in the kingdom of Hungary. It was anciently a kingdom of itself; bounded on the N. by Bosnia, on the E. by Servia, on the S. by Albania, and on the W. by Morlachia and the gulph of Venice. In the 15th century the Venetians were masters of all Dalmatia, but afterwards the Turks took a great part of it from them: the former however are still in possession of some towns on the coast, and the Hungarians and Regusans enjoy some other parts. The language and manners of the Dalmatians are Sclandinish, and they themselves are Roman Catholics. The more particular division of Dalmatia is into, 1. Hungarian Dalmatia, consisting of 5 districts; namely, Zenghi and Ottoschatz, the counties of Lyka and Corbau, and the district of Zwonigrod. It lies in the upper part of the Adriatic sea, and includes a part of the old Liburnia. 2. Venetian Dalmatia, comprehending a part of Liburnia, consists of the main-land of islands. 3. Regusan Dalmatia; and, 4. Turkish Dalmatia. The rivers in Dalmatia have indeed but a short course, yet they are mostly navigable. The country is full of mountains, having vines, olive and myrtle trees, with great numbers of medicinal herbs growing upon them: and their bowels contain gold and silver ore. The soil of the rest of the country is also fertile; and the breeding of sheep is a considerable article. The air is temperate and clear.

DALTON, a market-town on the coast of Lancashire, in a tract called Fourness, towards which the sands are almost impracticable. Here are two annual fairs, on June 6 for horned cattle, and October 23, for cattle, horses, and pedlary. It is seated on the spring-head of a river, in a champaign country, not far from the sea; and the ancient castle is made use of to keep the records, and prisoners for debt in the liberty of Furness. It is 20 miles N. W. of Lancaster, and 257 of London.

DALWOOD, a village of Dorsetshire, to the W. of Dorchester, with a fair on the 1st Wednesday before August 24, for cattle.

DAM, a town of Groningen, one of the Seven United Provinces of the Netherlands, on the Damsterdiep channel, near the Dollart bay, 15 miles N. E. of Groningen city, and 3 from the mouth of the Ems. Lat. 53, 32, N. Long. 7, 14, E.

DAM, a small, but fortified town of Swedish Pomerania, in Germany, at the junction of the Ploene with the Oder, opposite to Stetin. Here are 3 annual fairs. The place is subject to the king of Prussia. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 15, 22, E.

DAMAN, a maritime town of the East Indies, at the entrance into the gulph of Cambaye. It is divided by the river Damam into 2 parts; 1 of which is called New Damam, and is a handsome town, well fortified, and defended by a good Portuguese garrison. The other is called Old Damam, and is very ill built. There is a harbour between the two towns defended by a fort. It was taken by the Portuguese in 1535. The Mogul has attempted to get possession of it several times, but always without effect. Long. 72, 37, E. Lat. 21, 5, N.

DAMAR, a considerable place of Zibet, in Arabia Felix and Turkey, in Asia, in the middle of

of a well-watered plain, which is fertile in corn, fruit, &c. It lies 40 miles from Zenon; and on the road from Idonia to Moaban, E. of the former, and W. of the latter. At some distance, on the road leading to it, is a very high hill, upon which is a magnificent mosque.

DAMASCUS, called by the Turks Schan, capital of the S. part of Syria, in Asiatic Turkey. It was long the royal residence for several successions of princes, and stands in a delightful and fertile plain, on the ancient Chrysothreus. Tamerlane took and destroyed its castle, and with it 300,000 Turks; before which time Damascus is said to have had 40 noble porticos, and 90,000 gold and silver lanthorns. In 1506 the Turks took it, and have kept possession of it ever since. Notwithstanding the tyranny of the Turkish government, Damascus is still a considerable place. It is situated in a plain of so great extent, that one can but just discern the mountains which compass it on the other side. It stands on the west side of the plain, about 2 miles from the head of the river Barrady, which waters it. It is of a long, strait figure, extending about 2 miles in length, adorned with mosques and steeples, and encompassed with gardens, computed to be full 30 miles round. The river Barrady, as soon as it issues from the clefts of the Antilibanus into the plain, is divided into three streams, whereof the middlemost and biggest runs directly to Damascus, and is distributed to all the cisterns and fountains of the city. The other 2 seem to be artificial; and are drawn round, one to the right, and the other to the left, on the borders of the gardens, into which they are let by little currents, and dispersed every where. The houses of the city, whose streets are very narrow, are all built on the outside either with sun-burnt brick, or Flemish wall: and yet it is no uncommon thing to see the gates and doors adorned with marble portals, carved and inlaid with great beauty and variety; and within these portals to find large square courts, beautified with fragrant trees and marble fountains, and compassed round with splendid apartments. In these apartments the ceilings are usually richly painted and gilded; and their duans, which are a sort of low stages seated in the pleafantest part of the room, and elevated about 16 or 18 inches above the floor, whereon the Turks eat, sleep, say their prayers, &c. are floored, and adorned on the sides with variety of marbles, mixed in Mosaic knots and mazes, spread with carpets, and furnished all round with bolsters and cushions, to the very height of luxury. In this city are shewn the church of John the Baptist, now converted into a famous mosque; the house of Ananias, which is only a small grotto or cellar, wherein is nothing remarkable; and the house of Judas, with whom Paul lodged. In this last is an old tomb, supposed to be that of Ananias; which the Turks hold in such veneration, that they keep a lamp continually burning over it. There is a castle belonging to Damascus, which is like a little town, having its own streets and houses; and in this castle a magazine of the famous Damascus steel was formerly kept. The fruit-tree called the damascene, and the flower called the damask rose, were transplanted from the gardens belonging to this city; and the silks and linens known by the name of damasks, were probably invented by the inhabitants.

Here are 15,000 janissaries constantly kept, with a begleberg or basha. It is the seat of a Greek patriarch; and was the birth-place of the famous St. John Damascia or Damascenus, and for his eloquence styled Chrysologus, but much more eminent for his orthodoxy and sanctity of life. He died here in 760. It lies 95 miles N. E. of Jerusalem, and 210 S. of Aleppo. Lat. 33, 25, N. Long. 37, 27, E.

DAMBEA, the capital of Abyssinia, and kingdom of the same name, in Africa. It lies at the head of the lake of Dambea or Bahr Tzania, as the natives call it. It lies 320 miles W. of the Red Sea. Lat. 14, 40, N. Long. 34, 20, E.

DAMBEA, (kingdom of,) in Africa. It lies N. of Gojama, from which it is parted by the Nile and lake of its own name. It is bounded on the N. by Sennar, or Nubia, Tigra and Dancalia on the E. and Chauglia and Agaus on the W. It is the flattest country in all Abyssinia, and consequently very subject to inundations: it is 90 miles from E. to W. and 36 from N. to S. exclusive of the lake; but 70 including that. The kingdom is governed by a viceroy. In it is a very high mountain, called Dancas, with a spacious plain at top, on which the emperor resided in a stately palace, after the European mode.

DAMBEA, (lake of,) in the above-mentioned kingdom of the same name, lies under lat. 13, 0, and about 100 miles from the source of the Nile, which falls into it on the W. side, and comes out of it on the S. E. It is about 30 leagues long, 12 in breadth, and 150 in circuit, exclusive of its deep bays or other windings; its water is clear and wholesome, with abundance of fish, particularly sea-horses, that come sometimes to land, and do a deal of damage; but some of the inhabitants make a livelihood by killing them. In it are about 21 islands; some pretty large and fertile, having fine orange and citron trees, which are scarcely to be met with any where else in the whole empire. It is navigated by flat-bottomed boats made of jonks or bamboes, growing along its banks.

DAMGARTIN, a strong town of Swedish Pomerania,

D A

Pomerania, in Germany, upon a gulph of the Baltic, towards the confines of Mecklenberg, and the river Recknitz, N. W. of its influx into that gulph. It has been often taken, particularly by the Danes and Prussians in 1715. It is 25 miles W. of Stralsund. Lat. 54. 34. N. Long. 12, 20, E.

DAMIANO, (St.) a town of Italy, in Montferrat, famous for a siege it sustained of 3 months, in 1553. The fortifications are now demolished; and it is 18 miles W. by N. of Vercelli. Long. 6, 3, E. Lat. 45, 33, N.

DAMIATA, DAMIETTA, or DUMIATA, in Lower Egypt, stands on one of the E. branches of the Nile, on the E. side, about 10 miles above the mouth of it (into the Mediterranean,) and about 90 E. of Alexandria, E. Long 31, 15. Lat. 31, 50. This branch, and that called the Pelusiac or utmost eastern (the scripture river of Egypt,) form a kind of small Delta, or triangular island, on the W. angle of which this city is situate. It is one of the most considerable for trade in the whole territory about it, and the most fertile in all Egypt, it being, besides corn, vines, &c. full of cassia, orange, lemon, date, and other trees, bearing the finest fruits most plentifully. It is reckoned one of the keys of Egypt, is large, though now ill-built, and hath about 25,000 inhabitants, without reckoning a good large, and populous town on the other side the river, chiefly inhabited by sailors and fishermen, and a much greater number of strangers which resort daily from all parts to traffic. But it hath undergone such dreadful catastrophes, that it is no wonder it makes no better figure than it does. It fell with the rest of Egypt under the yoke of the Saracens, who held it till 1218, when the croisadors laid siege to it, and took it the next year, but had scarce held it 3 years, when those infidels letting out the water about them, forced them to abandon it. Lewis, surnamed Saint, king of France, regained it in 1249, but having been taken prisoner about a year after, was forced to restore it for his ransom. The Saracens then, it is said, burnt it; that it might be no more such a bone of contention. It soon recovered, and is now a place of great trade, and seat of an archbishop under the patriarch of Alexandria.

Copts and Greeks settled here have each a church and free exercise of religion. It is surrounded with old broken walls, except at the water-side, and hath a long street from thence quite to the other end of the town in a strait line, in which are rich warehouses and other buildings, irregularly built. The point towards the sea is defended by a large square tower; but hath little or no artillery; and the opposite point has still an old fort, but very much decayed and without cannon. The town is under the government of an aga, cadi, and sub-bachi, all 3 appointed by the bassa of the province, who exacts part of their income, &c. The inhabitants are severally employed in manufactures, particularly of the fine linen cloth, of all colours, in great request. But they so abhor strangers, especially Europeans (on account of the croisado or holy war, the chief scene of which in Egypt was hereabout,) that they can scarce let them pass along without insult. Damietta is not to be confounded with the ancient Pelusium. It lies about 5 miles from the sea, and 105 N. of Grand Cairo. Lat. 31, 15, N. Long. 31, 50, E.

DAMME, a fortress of Dutch Flanders, in the Netherlands, 5 miles N. E. of Bruges. Lat. 51, 26, N. Long. 3, 9, E.

DAMPIER'S STRAITS, a passage or opening discovered by Dampier, between king William's Cape in New Guinea, in the antarctic countries, and that tract to the E. of it, with which it was formerly thought to join. In it are several islands, the largest of which lie on the N. side. The channel is very good between the islands and the land, to the eastward.

DAMSEY, a small but fruitful isle of the Orkneys, in the N. of Scotland. It lies 3 miles W. of Kirkwall, and abounds with fish round its coasts.

DAMVILLE, a large bourg of Evreux and Normandy, in France, upon the rivulet Iton. It is a duchy peerdom.

DAMVILLIERS, a small town of French Luxemburg, in the government of Metz, belonging to France. It stands in a marshy country, which the emperor Charles V. fortified in 1528. It was taken by king Henry II. and Lewis XIII. and ceded to Lewis XIV. by the treaty of the Pyrenees, who dismantled it in 1673. It borders on Lorraine, 32 miles W. of Thionville. Lat. 49, 28, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

DAN, a city mentioned Gen. xiv. 14. situated at the head of the river Jordan, and at the northern extremity of the land of Israel, as Beersheba was at the southern, whence the expression, "from Dan to Beersheba."

DANAGAR. See ANDANAGAR.

DANAPRIS, one of the names of the Dnieper.

DANBURY, a town in Fairfield county, Connecticut, on a branch of the river Stratford, 10 miles N. E. of Ridgefield, 7 miles E. from Newtown, and 13 S. of New-Fairfield, 25 from New-York, where the king's troops, April 27, 1777, destroyed a very large magazine of rebel stores.

DANCALA, a town of Nubia, in Africa, on the Nile. It lies 266 miles S. W. of Sagnem. Lat. 17, 20, N. Long. 33, 40, E.

DANCALI,

DANTZICK in POLISH PRUSSIA.

D A

DANCALI, (kingdom of) on the Abassian coast in Africa. It extends from Bahrnagals beyond the straits of Babelmandel. It is bounded on the N. and E. by the Red Sea; on the S. by the kingdoms of Dwaro and Ghedm, and on the W. by those of Tigra and Angot. It is under the dominion of the Turks. It is particularly noted for its salt-mines, of which commodity vast quantities are exported on camels backs. The river Hanazo, rises on its S. W. confines, and divides it from the Dwaro, Ghedm, and Barragian; but the soil is sandy, barren, and full of brambles. The ridge Ahhondab is the most considerable of its mountains, and forms its eastern boundary. They are in great want of water here; especially in winter; and what they dig is brackish. Nothing grows in this country but some wild herbs or leaves, which serve to feed their goats, the only quadrupede in it. It lies W. of the Red Sea. Its sea port town is called Bailer.

DANDA, a Portuguese factory on Bombay coast, in India, according to Corneille stands on the river Derri, which enters the sea near the isles, by the Portuguese called Quemadas. It is a pretty large town with handsome streets, 9 leagues from the mountains of Ballagate. M. de Lisle makes it a village between Chaul on the N. and Dabal S. about 5 hours sail from both. It is reckoned by others 45 miles S. E. from Bombay, and 9 leagues from Goa, to which it drives good trade.

DANDE, a river of Congo, Africa, is capable of receiving vessels of 100 tons.

DANDERA, the ancient Tentyra, a city in the Thebais or Upper Egypt, justly obtains a place here for its very remarkable remains of beautiful, curious, and magnificent antiquities. For there are yet standing part of a temple, or palace, of surprising height and dimensions.

DANE, a river of Lancashire, made navigable, so that the Liverpool merchants come by that means so near the Trent with their goods, that they easily carry them by land to Burton; and from thence correspond even as far as Hull.

DANE, a river in Cheshire, which runs into the Weaver at Northwich.

DANEBERG, by the Germans Dannenberg, or rather Tannenberg, i. e. a mountain of fir-trees, is a territory in the E. part of the duchy of Brunswick Lunenburg, in Germany. It lies along the Elbe, being bounded by Mecklenburg on the N. Brandenburg on the E. and S. and Lunenburg on the W.

Of the same name is its capital on the river Jetze. Both it and the country are subject to the elector of Hanover, as duke of Lunenburg Zell. It lies 35 miles S. E. of Lunenburg. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 11, 18, E.

D A

DANISCHE-WALD, a territory of Sleswick in Denmark, separated from Holstein by the Levens-au, being two miles and a half in length, and one and a half in breadth.

DANNAU, or DOMNAU, an indifferent little town of Brandenburg circle, in the kingdom of Prussia; but it has a castle, and in its neighbourhood are several remains of antiquities.

DANNEMORA, one of the oldest, largest, and most considerable iron-pits in all Sweden: from this mine are annually dug from 40 to 50,000 fodder of crude ore. It lies 4 miles from Upsal.

DANTZIC, the metropolis of the palatinate of Pomeralla in Poland, standing on a branch of the Vistula, about 4 miles above where it falls into the Baltic; in E. Long. 18, 36. N. Lat. 54, 20. It is large, populous, and rich: and carries on a vast trade, being the chief mart and magazine of Poland, and one of the greatest granaries in the world; so that whole fleets of ships come hither every year to load with corn alone. It consists of the Old and New town, with their suburbs, has a fine harbour, a great number of ships, and had many valuable privileges. Among the last, were those of coining money, gathering amber, and sending representatives to the general diets of Poland and the Prussian senate. It is well fortified, but being commanded by 2 hills on the S. side, cannot sustain a long siege. It is computed that 365,000 lasts of Polish wheat are shipped from this place one year with another. Hither Poland sends its commodities for exportation, and from hence is chiefly supplied with those of other countries. Among the latter are great quantities of herrings, both Scotch and Dutch. The exports and imports consist of a variety of articles, and furnish a vast deal of business and wealth to the city. The inhabitants who are computed at 200,000, are mostly Lutherans, with a mixture of Calvinists and Papists.

A constant garrison of 200 soldiers is kept in the city. One of the suburbs is called Scotland; and the Scots have great privileges in consequence of their gallant defence of the town, under one of the family of Douglas, when it was besieged by the Poles. It is said there are upwards of 30,000 pedlars of that nation in Poland, who travel on foot, and some with 3, 4, or 5 horses. In king Charles II.'s time there were about 53,000: in that reign Sir John Denham and Mr. Killegrew were sent to take the number of them, and to tax them by the poll, with the king of Poland's licence; which having obtained, they brought home 10,000l. sterl. besides their charges in the journey.

Here is a Lutheran college with 7 professors, and one teacher of the Polish language. At the mouth of the Vistula, which is defended by several forts, is a good harbour belonging to Dantzic. Its territory territory consists mostly of islands formed by the Vistula and Motlau. It is hardly credible how this city has changed its masters in competition for the crown of Poland, and what sums have been extorted from it. While the kingdom of Poland remained, Dantzie was under its protection, but governed by its own magistrates in the form of a republic; but since the destruction of that kingdom, the city of Dantzie has been greatly oppressed by the king of Prussia.

DANTZIGER-WERDER, a part of the jurisdiction belonging to the city of Dantzie last-mentioned. It is surrounded by the Vistula, Motlau, and their morasses, containing 33 villages, 12 of which have churches, and among these is one for Calvinists, and 2 chapels. It is governed by the oldest burgomaster of Dantzie, and 2 counsellors, as directors and inspectors with him.

DANUBE, the largest and most considerable river in Europe, rising in the Black Forest, near Zumberg; and running N. E. through Suabia by Ulm, the capital of that country; then running E. through Bassaria and Austria, passes by Ratisbon, Passau, Ens, and Vienna. It then enters Hungary, and runs S. E. from Presburg, to Buda, and so on to Belgrade; after which it divides Bulgaria from Molachia and Moldavia, discharging itself by several channels into the Black Sea, in the province of Bessarabia. Towards the mouth, it was called the Ister by the ancients; and it is now said, that 4 of the mouths are choked up with sand, and that there are only 2 remaining. It begins to be navigable for boats at Ulm, and receives several large rivers as it passes along. It is so deep between Buda and Belgrade, that the Turks and Christians have had men of war upon it; and yet it is not navigable to the Black Sea, on account of the cataracts.

DAPHNE, a sort of suburb to the city of Antioch, in Cælo-Syria and Turkey in Asia.

DARAS, or DARIA, a frontier town of Mesopotamia, towards Persia, situate on the Cardus, about 15 miles from Nisibis, and 3 from Carrhæ. It was a place of great importance; and afterwards called Anastatia, by the emperor Anasthatius.

DARBY, rather DERBY; which see.

DARDA, or TARDA, a town of Lower Hungary, and Farther Circle of the Danube on the W. side of the river, and not far from the Drave. It was formerly fortified, in order to defend the N. end of the bridge of Esbeck, but was taken by the Imperialists in 1686 (1697.) It lies 8 miles N. of Esbeck. Lat. 46, 17, N. Long. 20, 17, E.

DARDANELLES, two famous castles called Sestos and Abydos. See CONSTANTINOPLE.

DARDANA, or DARDANUM, anciently a city of Phrygia, so named from Dardanus the Trojan king, who built it, and made it his royal seat, near a promontory bearing the same name. It communicated its name to the neighbouring country, and in length of time to all Troas. (See PHRYGIA MINOR.) Here Mithridates and Sylla concluded a peace. Some say, (on what foundation we know not,) Dardanum was the patrimony of Æneas.

D A

DARDOGNE, one of the principal rivers of Auvergne, in France, which has its spring upon one of the highest mountains in this country, called Mount d'Or, and loses itself in the river Garonne.

DAREN-SEE, one of the considerable inland lakes in Upper Alsatia, and Wasgaw mountains, belonging to France.

DARHA, (province of,) in Africa. It contains the greatest part of the ancient Mauritania Cæsariensis. Mount Atlas divides it from Morocco on the N. it is bounded by Sus and Gesula on the W. Tafilet on the E. and by Libya, and part of Teflet, on the S. Its longest extent is about 300 miles, containing several towns and castles, along the banks of the Darha, though none of them very considerable, but the ruins of others, which seem to have once made a better figure. Some territories of it produce corn, particularly those overflown, which happens in April: but with most of this they are supplied from Morocco and Fez, in exchange for dates; most parts yield such vast quantities of these, that the inhabitants feed their horses, camels, &c. with the worst, and live on or traffic with the rest. Besides these, their common food is the flesh of horses, camels, ostriches, and some wild beasts; but they never eat bread except at their festivals. In this province indigo grows wild, great quantities of which are made and exported.

DARAB-GERD, or DARABEGERD, (or as the Arabs call it, Valasgerd,) in the province of Kerestan, Persia, is the ancient Pasagarda or Passagarda, or Pascaecarta, 65 miles from Kerman, to S. W. Near this town is found salt, white, black, red, and green, and a drug called mummy, very much esteemed in Persia, as being a sovereign remedy to set dislocated bones. The soil produces oranges, lemons, and apples, of which they make cider. They make here long-necked glass bottles, prettily worked.

DAREL-HAMARA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez, built by the Romans. Its trade consists in oil and corn; and it is seated on a mountain. Long. 8, 35, W. Lat. 34, 20, N.

DARENT, a river in Kent, which runs into the Thames near Dartford.

DARIEN, or the isthmus of Panama, is a province between South and North America, being a narrow isthmus, or neck of land, which joins them together. It is bounded on the N. by the North North Sea, on the south by the South Sea, on the east by the gulph or river of Darien, and on the west by another part of the South Sea and the province of Veragua. It lies in the form of a bow, or crescent, about the great bay of Panama, in the South Sea; and is 300 miles in length, and 60 in breadth. This province is not the richest, but is of the greatest importance to Spain, and has been the scene of more actions than any other in America. The wealth of Peru is brought hither, and from hence exported to Europe. This has induced many enterprising people to make attempts on Panama, Porto-Bello, and other towns of this province, in hopes of obtaining a rich booty.

The Scotch got possession of part of this province in 1699, and had laid the foundations of a new town, designing to call it New Edinburgh; but as the English were then in alliance with the Spaniards, king William would not permit them to go on. However, this country is not a very desirable place to settle in, it being generally mountainous and barren, as well as excessive hot; and the lower grounds are liable to be suddenly overflowed in the rainy season. Some of the mountains are so high, and of such difficult access, that it requires several days to pass them. It was from these mountains the Spaniards first discovered the South Sea, or Pacific Ocean, in 1513.

DARIEN, in Georgia, so called by the Scots Highlanders who settled there in 1736. The said settlement is by the side of the river Alatomala, about 12 miles from the sea, where they raised a fort, &c.

DARKEHMEN, a town of Tapiaw, and Justerburg Circle, in the kingdom of Prussia, peopled by Saltzburghers in 1732. Here is a beneficial manufacture of linen and woollen cloth; also a fabric of tobacco, and a powder-mill.

DARKING, a market-town of Surry, famous for the large Roman causeway, called Stony-street, and the waste of Cottman-dean. Here is every Thursday a considerable market, especially in the season for fat geese and capons, and annually on Holy Thursday; the greatest market in all England for lambs is held here. It lies 12 miles from Guildford, and 20 from London.

DARLEY-FLASH, a village in Derbyshire, with 2 fairs, on May 13, and October 27.

DARLINGTON, a large market-town in the bishopric of Durham, of great resort, and well supplied; the weekly market holds on Mondays. Its annual fairs are on Easter-Monday, Whitfun-Monday, Monday fortnight following, and Nov. 22, for cattle, horses, and sheep. It is noted for its linen manufacture, as the water of the Skern, on which it lies, is very good for bleaching. It particularly excels in huggabags, large quantities of which are sent to London. It lies 24 miles from the city of Durham, and 243 from London.

DARNALL, a river in Radnorshire, which runs into the Wye above Rayader Gowy.

DARNEY, a burgh of Vauge, in Lorraine, on the Saone, and is the principal place of a provostship.

DARMSTADT, the capital of Hesse-Darmstadt, and the Upper Rhine in Germany, a small city on a river of the same name, and subject to its own landgrave. It has a strong castle, which is the prince's palace, and a handsome structure, with Fort Marienburg on the Rhine, and Fort Ruffenheim on the Maine. Most of the houses are of free-stone and high. The neighbourhood of this town abounds with deer; it is a flat country and gravelly soil: from hence to Heidelberg is the Bergstrafs, or hill-road, 40 miles long, and planted with trees on both sides. Lat. 49, 26, N. Long. 8, 32, E.

DAROCA, (city of,) in Aragon, walled, and stands on the river Xiloca, on a rough and craggy site, of difficult access. Here are 7 parishes, one of which is collegiate, containing 1000 families. The neighbouring plain is very fruitful. Here are 4 monasteries, &c. 7 squares, and as many conduits. It lies 48 miles S. from Saragossa.

DART, a river of Devonshire. It took its name from a dart or arrow, either from the swiftness or the straightness of its current, and also gives its name to the forest where it rises, and to the port-town where it makes its influx into the British Channel.

DARTFORD, or rather Darentford, a market town in Kent, so called from its situation on the river Darent which runs through it. It is a handsome large town, its market for corn being much frequented by corn-dealers and meal-men; and has good houses, good springs, and is full of inns and other public houses, being a high-road thoroughfare from London to Gravesend, Canterbury, Dover, &c. It has also a harbour for barges. Here are also 2 church-yards, one about the church, the other on the top of the hill towards Northfleet, which is so steep and high, that it overlooks the tower of the church. Wat Tyler and Jack Straw's rebellion began in this town. The first paper-mill in England was built on this river by Sir John Spilman, to whom king Charles I. granted a patent, with 200 l. a year to encourage that most useful manufacture. On it was also the first mill for slitting iron bars to make wire. Market on Saturday, Fair, July 22.

DARTMOUTH, in Devonshire, is a corporation formed out of Clifton, Dartmouth, and Hardnefs, which were originally 3 distinct towns. It is 203 miles from London, and 31 miles from Exeter.

D A

Exeter. The river Dart, which rises in Dartmoor-forest, runs into its harbour. It was called Clifton, from the cliffs on which most of the houses were founded, and out of which many of them were dug. It was burnt in the reign of Richard I. by the French, and again in the reign of Hen. IV. They attempted it afterwards, but were repulsed, and chiefly by the bravery of the women, who fought like Amazons, that, besides a great slaughter which they made, they took M. Castel, the French general, 3 lords, and 23 knights prisoners. It is governed by a mayor, 12 masters, or magistrates, 12 common council-men, a recorder, 2 bailiffs, a town-clerk, and a high steward; the 3 last chosen by the mayor and magistrates, who have a power to make freemen. The mayor, bailiffs, and coroner are chosen yearly. Here is a court of session, and a water bailiffwic court, holden by a lease from the duchy of Cornwall for 3 lives, for which they pay 14 l. a year chief rent. The town, which is a mile long, stands on the side of a craggy hill, with streets very irregular, being sometimes 2 or 3 one above another; yet the houses are generally very high. 500 sail of ships may ride in its harbour, which is defended by 3 castles, besides forts and block-houses; and its entrance may, upon occasion, be shut up with a chain. Here is a large quay, and before it a spacious street, where live some considerable merchants, who trade to Portugal, Italy, Newfoundland, &c. and from the latter to Italy, &c. with fish. Here is the greatest pilchard fishery also of any place in the west, except Falmouth. The property of the manor is vested in the corporation. Here are 3 charity schools, besides a large dissenting meeting-house. The shipping and trade of this port and town was the most considerable of any in the county, except Exeter, till Plymouth's late increase in both. Its market is on Friday. This was first made a mayor and borough town by king John; king Edward III. granted that the burgesses should be toll free throughout England, &c. Richard II. in consideration of their having assisted him with ammunition and provisions in his war with France, enacted, that tin should only be exported from hence. King Edward IV. to reward their courage against the French, translated the port hither from Fowey, and gave them 20 l. a year in free-farm; to which Richard III. and Henry VII. added 20 l. a year more. It began to send members to parliament the 26th of Edward I. but no more, till the 14th of Edward III.

DARTOW, or YARROW, a river in Lancashire, which runs into the Dowlas near Croston.

DARWENT-FELLS, in Cumberland, are the mountains between Borodale and Keswick, where were formerly discovered some veins of copper, with a mixture of gold and silver; concerning which there was a trial between queen Elizabeth and Thomas Percy earl of Northumberland and lord of the manor, who was cast. Here is also a mine of black lead for painters, or wadd for cleaning arms; of which as much may be dug in one year, as will serve all Europe 7 years.

DARWENT. See DERWENT.

DASSEN-EYLAND, or THE ISLE OF DEER, is one of the 3 small islands to the N. of the Cape of Good Hope; so called, on account of the great number of deer which were first carried thither in 1601. There are also sheep there, whose tails weigh 10 pounds.

DAVENTRY, or DAINTRY, in Northamptonshire, seated on the rise of a small hill, 73 miles from London, in the road to Chester, a town of greater antiquity than beauty, is a great thoroughfare to and from the N. W. counties, and so has many good inns. It is governed by a mayor, aldermen, and steward, with 12 freemen. Roman coins are often dug up here; and on Borough-Hill are still to be seen the ruins of an old Roman fortification, 3 miles in compass. The Roman Watling-street was turned into it, and runs to Dunsmore heath. The Saxons occupied the same camp. Market on Wednesday. Fairs on Easter-Tuesday, Whitsun-Tuesday, July 23, Aug 4, 28, and September 21.

ST. DAVID'S, in Pembrokeshire, 16 miles from Haverford-West, and 272 from London, was formerly an archbishop's see. In king Arthur's days it was the metropolitan of the British church, and so continued till the reign of Henry I. at which time Bernard, who was the 47th archbishop of St. David's, became suffragan to the see of Canterbury. As the situation of it is so very unhealthy, and the soil all round it so very barren, it has little or nothing now to boast of but its cathedral, which is 300 feet long, and about 127 feet high, an ancient and venerable building, and though the east end of it is in ruins, the western part and choir is in good repair. It is at present a bishop's see. Market on Wednesday. This place is the most western of the main land of Wales.

DAVID'S, (FORT ST.) a town on the Coromandel coast, and one of the strongest forts belonging to the English East-India company in that part of the world; from which chints, muslins, and calicoes are exported. The French took it in 1758, notwithstanding their fleet before it was defeated by admiral Pocock; and they besieged it also in 1747, but without success. It lies 86 miles S. of Madras. Lat. 12, 5, N. Long. 80, 55, E.

DAVIDSOE,

D · A

DAVIDSOE, or DAWS, an island of Westmannia, in Sweden Proper, takes its name from the first Christian preacher in this province, namely St. David, who came hither out of England about the year 1060, and founded a convent. It is now a gentleman's seat.

DAVIS'S STRAITS, a narrow sea running N. W. from Cape Farewell, in lat. 60, N. to Baffin's bay, in lat. 80, discovered in 1585. It separates Groenland from North America. One Davis, an Englishman, passed them in 1585, in quest of a N. W. passage. It has the city of Groenland on the E. and an unknown polar country on the N. and W.

DAULE, a lieutenantancy of Guayaquil, in South America. Its principal town is of the same name, and washed by a river, to which it owes its denomination. It contains many spacious houses of the inhabitants of Guayaquil. Here are great numbers of plantations, large orchards, and extensive corn-fields. The river Daule, which discharges itself into that of Guayaquil, is very large; and a great trade is carried on with that city, from which it receives variety of summer fruits and plantanes for bread. The tobacco of Daule is reckoned preferable to that of any other part.

DAULIS, anciently a city of Phocis, not so remarkable for its bigness or richness as for the tallness and stoutness of its inhabitants; and it was much more remarkable for the inhuman repast which was served there to Tereus, king of Thrace, by the women of this city, by whom he was soon after murdered for the double injury he had done to his sister Philomela, daughter of Pandion.

DAUMA, a town and kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, whose inhabitants are said to be very rich. Long. 14, 30, E. Lat. 8, 0, N.

DAUN, a town in Germany, in the electorate of Treves, or Triers, seated on the river Lezer, at the foot of a mountain on which a castle is built that commands it. It is 12 miles N. of Montroyal.

DAVOS, or TAPPAAS, the capital of a community among the mountains in the league of the 10 jurisdictions and Grisons, in Switzerland. Here is the seat of the regency, and the assemblies of the leagues of the Grisons. It lies about 2 leagues E. of Coire.

DAUPHIN, a fort belonging to the French on the E. coast of Madagascar, in Africa. Lat. 23, 59, S. Long. 48, 16, E.

DAUPHIN, (isle of,) a small settlement in Canada, in North America, about 70 leagues E. of the mouth of the Mississippi, on the river Mobile: it is 5 leagues in length, but of a small breadth. Not a tree is to be seen in one half of this island; and the other is not much better. The fort, and the only village, or dwelling place which remains on it, are situated in the western part of the island. Between Pisle Dauphin and Pisle Corne, which is a league distant from the former, is but little water. At the extremity of the latter is another very small island, called Pisle Ronde, on account of its figure. Lat. 30, 10, N. Long. 88, 7, W.

DAUPHINE D'AUVERGNE, a principality in the government of the latter name, in France, belonging to the duke of Orleans.

DAUPHINY, or DELPHINATE, one of the governments in France. This province is bounded on the N. by the territory of Bresse, and the river Rhone; on the E. it is separated by the Alps from Savoy and Piemont; it has Provence on the S. and the Rhone again towards the W. It lies between lat. 44, 30, almost as far as lat. 46. It had formerly its own princes; the last of whom, Dauphin Humbert, about the year 1343, made his country over to Philip VI. king of France, upon condition that the king's eldest son should enjoy it, which ever since has given him title accordingly. It is divided into Upper and Lower Dauphiny. The latter is pretty fruitful, producing corn, wine, olives, silk, hemp, salt, vitriol, varnish, crystal, iron, copper, and lead. But Upper Dauphiny, and in general two-thirds of the province, are barren; so that part of the inhabitants are obliged to go and seek their bread elsewhere. Its mountains, however, produce several useful things, and contain in their bowels many rarities. Upon the mountains of Ambrun and Die is found marcasite, Mount Bresier, not far from the village of St. Genis, sometimes throws out fire. Upon Mount d'Or, a kind of diamond is to be met with. Those between Briançon, Pragelas, and Pignerol, are covered with larch-trees, the timber of which is durable, and on its bark are found manna, aromatic benzoin, and agaric, a sort of excrescence which is much used in physic, and for dying of scarlet. In its mountains are also bouquetins, a sort of wild goat, besides the common ones; bears, and marmottes; likewise white hares, white partridges, pheasants, eagles, and hawks, are very frequent in this country. Its principal rivers are the Rhone, Durance, Isere, and Drome. In it are 2 archbishoprics, and 5 bishoprics. Here justice is administered according to the civil law; and it has besides particular customs of its own. Here is a parliament, in which the governor and lieutenant-general have a seat, even before the first presidents. With regard to military government, besides the governor and lieutenant-general just mentioned, it has 4 sub-governors; namely, one for Grenoble and Briançon; the second for Ambrun and Gap; the third for Vienne and St. Marcellin; and the fourth for Valentinois, Diois, Tricastinois, and the baronies.

The

The Upper Delphinat comprehends Graisivaudan, the little territory of Champagny, Briançonnois, Ambrunois, Gapençois, Les Roynéz, and the baronies of Meuoillon and Montauban. To the Lower Delphinat belong Viennois, Valentinois, Le Dios, Tricastin, and the principality of Orange. In this country are several mineral springs, besides the following 7 pretended wonders, namely, the tower without venom, the inaccessible mountain, the burning spring, the precious stones and wells of Sassenage, the manna of Briançon, and the grotto of our Lady de la Balme.

DAURIA, a large province towards the confines of the eastern part of Tartary. It is reckoned a part of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, and takes its name from being full of rivers. This country has been conquered by the Muscovites, and put under the vassalage of Siberia in temporals, and metropolitan of the same in ecclesiastical matters.

DAWO. See DAVIDSO.

DAX, the capital of Aquitaine in Gascony, in France, upon the river Ardour. See ACQS.

DEAD-CHEST, (island) one of the smaller Virgin Isles.

DEADHAM, a small town in Suffolk county, Massachusetts Bay.

DEAD-MANS-HEAD, a point of land near Tregony, in Cornwall, lying between St. Maws and Fowey.

DEAD SEA, or LAKE ASPHALTIS, in Latin, Mare Mortuum, and from its situation, the East Sea, the Salt Sea, the Sea of Sodom, the Sea of the Desert, and Sea of the Plain, by the sacred writings; a lake of Judea. Many things have been said or written of this famous, or if they were indeed true, rather infamous lake; such as that it arose from the submersion of the vale of Siddim, where once stood, as is commonly reported, the 3 cities which perished in the miraculous conflagration, with those of Sodom and Gomorrah, for their unnatural and detestable wickedness; on which account this lake has been looked upon as a lasting monument of the just judgment of God, to deter mankind from such abominations. Hence it is added, that the waters of the lake are so impregnated with salt, sulphur, and other bituminous stuff, that nothing will sink or live in it; and that it casts such stench and smoke, that the very birds die in attempting to fly over it. The description likewise of the apples that grew about it, fair without, and only ashes and bitterness within, were looked upon as a farther monument of God's anger. So likewise the description which many travellers give not only of the lake, but of all the country round about, of the whole appearing dreadful to behold, all sulphurous, bituminous, stinking, and suffocating: and lastly, what hath been farther affirmed of the ruins of the 5 cities being still to be seen in clear weather, and having been actually seen in these later times; all these surprising things, and ill-grounded notions, though commonly, and so long received among Christians, have been of late so much exploded, not only by the testimony of very credible witnesses, but even by arguments drawn from scripture, that we must give them up as inventions, unless we will suppose the nature of all these things to have been entirely changed; those in particular, of bodies not sinking in the water, and of birds being stifled by the exhalations of it, appear now false in fact.

It is true, the quantity of salt, allum, and sulphur, with which it is impregnated, render it so much specifically heavier (Dr. Pococke says one-fifth,) than fresh-water, that bodies will not so easily sink; yet that author, and others, assure us, they have swam and dived in it; and, as to the birds, we are told likewise, that they will fly over it without any harm. To reconcile these things with the experiments which Pliny tells us had been made by Vespasian, is impossible, without supposing that those ingredients have been since much exhausted, which is not at all improbable; such quantities of them, that is, of the bitumen and salt, having been all along, and being still taken off, and such streams of fresh water continually pouring into it, as may reasonably be supposed to have considerably diminished its gravity and denseness. For, with respect to its salt, we are told, the Arabs made quantities of it from that lake, in large pits about the shore, which they fill with that water, and leave to be crystallized by the sun. This salt is in some cases much commended by Galen, as very wholesome, and a strengthener of the stomach, &c. on account of its unpleasant bitterness.

What likewise relates to the constant smoke ascending from the lake, its changing the colour of its water three times a-day, so confidently affirmed by Josephus and other ancients, and confirmed by prince Radziville, and other moderns, who pretend to have been eye-witnesses of it, is all now in the same manner exploded by others of more modern date, and of at least equal candour. The unhealthiness of the air about the lake was affirmed by Josephus and Pliny, especially on the west; the monks that live in the neighbourhood confirm the same, and would have dissuaded Dr. Pococke from going to it on that account; and, as he ventured to go and bathe in it, and was two days after seized with a dizziness, and violent pain in the stomach, which lasted near 3 weeks, they made no doubt but it was occasioned by it; and he doth not seem to contradict them.

As to the water, it is, though clear, so impregnated

nated with salt, that those who dive into it, come out covered with a kind of saline matter. There is one remarkable thing relating to this lake, generally agreed on by all travellers and geographers; viz. that it receives the waters of Jordan, a considerable river, the brooks of Jabok, Kishon, Arnon, and other springs which flow into it from the adjacent mountains, and yet never overflows, though there is no visible way to be found by which it discharges that great influx. The common opinion is, that it hath some subterraneous vent, either into the Mediterranean, or the Red Sea; but Dr. Shaw hath endeavoured to account for it in the same ingenious way as Dr. Halley had done by the Mediterranean; that is, by exhalation, without having recourse to any other solution.

It is inclosed on the E. and W. with exceeding high mountains, many of them craggy, and dreadful to behold; on the N. it has the plain of Jericho, or if we take in both sides of the Jordan, it has the Great Plain, properly so called, on the S. which is open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye. Josephus gives this lake 580 furlongs in length, from the mouth of the Jordan, to the town of Segor, on the opposite end; i. e. about 22 leagues; and about 150 furlongs, or 5 leagues in its largest breadth; but our modern accounts commonly give it 24 leagues in length, and 6 or 7 in breadth. On the W. side of it is a kind of promontory, where they pretend to shew the remains of Lot's metamorphosed wife. Josephus says it was still standing in his time; but when prince Radziville inquired after it, they told him there was no such salt pillar or statue to be found in all that part. However, they have found means about a century after him, to recover, as they pretended to assure Mr. Maundrell, a block or stump of it, which may in time grow up, with a little art, into its ancient bulk.

It is to be observed here, that the name of Dead Sea, is not to be found in the sacred writings, but hath been given to this lake because no creature will live in it, on account of its excessive saltiness, or rather bituminous quality; for the Hebrews rank sulphur, nitre, and bitumen, under the general name of salt. However, some late travellers have found cause to suspect the common report of its breeding no living creature; one of them having observed, on the shore, 2 or 3 shells of fish like those of an oyster, and which he supposes to have been thrown up by the waves, at 2 hours distance from the mouth of the Jordan, which he there takes notice of, lest they should be suspected to have been brought into the lake by that way. And Dr. Pococke, though he neither saw fish nor shells, tells us, on the authority of a monk, that some sort of fish had been caught in it; and gives us his opinion, that as so many sorts live in salt water, some kind may be so formed as to live in a bituminous one.

It is on account of this bitumen that it hath had the name of Asphaltite Lake, it being reported to have thrown up great quantities of that drug, which was much in use among the Egyptians, and other nations, for embalming of dead bodies. Josephus assures us, that in his days it rose in lumps as big as an ox without its head, and some even larger. But whatever it may have formerly done, we are assured by Mr. Maundrell and others, that it is now to be found but in small quantities along the shore, though in much greater near the mountains on both sides the lake. But the contrary is since affirmed by 2 or more late travellers, the one of whom tells us, that it is observed to float on the surface of the water, and to come on the shore, after windy weather, where the Arabians gather it, and put it to all the uses that common pitch is used for, even in the compositions of some medicines; and another tells us, he was there informed, that it was raised at certain times from the bottom, in large hemispheres, which as soon as they touch the surface, and are acted upon by the external air, burst at once with great noise and smoke, like the pulvis fulminans of the chemists, dispersing themselves about in 1000 pieces. From both these judicious authors, we may conclude the reason of Mr. Maundrell's mistake, both as to the lake's throwing it up only on certain seasons, (that reverend gentleman might chance to be there at the wrong time;) and likewise as to his not observing it about the shores, seeing the Arabs are there ready to gather it as soon as thrown up, all of them describe it as resembling our black pitch, so as not to be distinguished from it but by its sulphureous smoke and stench when set on fire; and it hath been commonly thought to be the same with that which our druggists sell under the name of bitumen Judaicum, or Jewish pitch, though we have reason to think that this last is fictitious, and that there is now none of the right asphaltum brought from Judea.

It hath, moreover, been confounded with a sort of blackish combustible stone thrown on the shore, and called by some Moses's stone, which, being held in the flame of a candle, will soon burn, and cast a smoke and intolerable stench; but with this extraordinary property, that though it loses much of its weight and colour, it becoming in a manner white, yet it diminishes nothing of its bulk. But these, Dr. Pococke tells us, are found about 2 or 3 leagues from the shore. He concludes, however, from it, that a stratum of that stone under the lake is probably one part of the matter that feeds the subterraneous fire, and causes the bitumen to boil up out of it.

DEAL, Kent, 7 miles from Sandwich, of which it is a member, 72 miles from London; is called Dola by Julius Cæsar, who is supposed to have landed here in his second attempt upon Britain. It has a church, a chapel, and about 1000 houses, which are mostly low, and built with bricks; these form 3 long but narrow streets. The inhabitants amount to about 4500, and subsist chiefly by smuggling, fishing, and carrying people to and from the ships in the Downs. Between this place and Godwin's Sands, are the Downs, where ships bound to and from London, and foreign parts, generally stop, if homeward-bound, to dispatch letters notifying their arrival, and to set passengers ashore; if outward-bound, to take in fresh provisions, and to receive their last letters from their owners and friends. Its castle is defended on the N. by Sandown-castle, and on the S. by Walmer-castle, all 3 built by king Henry VIII. Here is a charity-school. A ridge of cliffs runs 7 miles along the coast from hence to Dover, which abound with samphire. Fairs April 5, and Oct. 10.

DEAN, a river in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire, which runs into the Trent at Newark.

DEAN, a town of Gloucestershire, with a market on Mondays, and 2 fairs, on Easter-Monday, and October 10, for cattle, sheep, and horses. It had its name from the forest of Dean, in which it is seated; 11 miles W. of Gloucester, and 140 W. S. W. of London. It is called Mitchell Dean, to distinguish it from a lesser town of the same name. The forest of Dean comprehends that part of Gloucestershire, which lies between the Severn and Monmouthshire, and contains 23 parishes and 4 market-towns, with many mines of iron and coal besides stone quarries.

DEBENHAM, from the river Deben, or Deepenham, from its deep roads; a town of Suffolk, standing high, but little frequented. Here is a free-school, where poor boys are put out apprentices with 10l. by appointment of Sir Robert Hitcham. It lies 22 miles from Bury St. Edmund's, and 86 from London. Its market is on Friday, and annual fair June 24, for toys and braziers.

DEBIR mentioned Jos. x. 39. and is reckoned among the cities given to the tribe of Judah.

DEBRETZEN, a royal free-town in the Farther Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It stands in a fine plain, is both large and populous, yet but indifferently built, with neither walls nor towers. Here the Jesuits had, as well as the Reformed, an academy. The breeding of cattle in these parts is considerable. For 12 miles and upwards, there is no hill nor wood, being a continued heath, and consequently in great want of timber. It has been thrice burnt down by accident. Lat. 47, 29, N. Long. 22, E.

DECAN, a kingdom of the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia. It is bounded on the N. by Cambaya, on the E. by Golconda and Berar, on the S. by Visapour, and on the W. it terminates on the Indian ocean. Here are but few towns; and those lie on the sea-coast. It is divided into 8 provinces, and 79 governments, all tributary to the Mogul, to whom it yields a revenue of 2,000,000 sterling, besides furnishing a considerable body of horse and foot. Caravans of 1000 beasts at a time are employed in carrying wheat and rice to Indostan, &c.

DECIZE, in Latin, Dececia, a very old town of Nivernois in France, on a rocky island in the river Loire, at the junction of the Airon with it. Here is a castle-ward, salt-granary, an ancient seat of the duke of Nevers, 2 convents, and an hospital; also a long bridge. Lat. 46, 46, N. Long. 3, 29, E.

DECKENDORF, a town of Bavaria, in Germany; on the Danube, 39 miles S. E. of Ratisbon. Lat. 48, 39, N. Long. 16, E.

DEDAN, is supposed to lie near Edom, because Ezekiel, chap. xxv. ver. 13. joins Dedan to it. Dedan was a city which had great dealings with Tyre. Some of the commodities mentioned are, ebony, ivory, and fine clothes. Ezekiel xxvii. 15, 20.

DEDDINGTON, in Oxfordshire, 62 miles from London; was anciently a corporation town, and sent members to parliament, in the reigns of Edward I. and III. but never since; yet it is a pretty large town governed by a bailiff. It is said here was formerly a castle. Here is a charity-school. It has a little market on Saturday, fairs on Whitsun Monday, August 10, and November 22. There is a school here, called Jesus-school. Near this town is a well of medicinal water, of a strong sulphureous scent, highly impregnated with vitrioline salt. In the digging of it was found the stone called pyrites argenteous, and a bed of belemnites, commonly called thunder-bolts: and out of it hath since been taken the silver marcasite, of a glistering colour.

DEDHAM, in Essex, has a market on Tuesdays, and a fair on Easter-Tuesday and Wednesday. It has one old large church which has a remarkable fine tower-steeple, of the Gothic order, and has a great deal of carved work about it, but this much injured by time; here is also a presbyterian meeting-house, and 3 very good schools. The town consists of about 400 lofty houses, and the streets, though not paved, are very clean, occasioned by their lying pretty high.

DEE, a river on which the city of Chester stands, and rises from lakes in the middle of the vast black mountains of Merionethshire, in North Wales.

Of the same name is a river running by the new town of Aberdeen, in the Middle Division of Scotland, in which they catch plenty of salmon; and about a mile above the town is a stately stone-bridge of 7 arches over it, built by bishop Gawin Dunbar.

Of the same name likewise is a river in Galloway, which enters the sea at Kirkcudbright, forming a harbour there. It rises out of the mountains of Carrick, and so full of turnings, that though it is not above 70 miles in a direct line, it runs near 200 in its winding course.

DEEPING-MARKET, in Lincolnshire, among the fens on the N. side of Welland river, 6 miles from Stamford, and 90 miles from London; is an old, ill-built, dirty town, with a market on Thursday, and fairs second Wednesday after May 11, Wednesday before August 1, and October 10. Below it is a plain many miles in compass, the deepest in all this marshy country; and it is remarkable, that the channel of the river Glen, which runs from the W. lies much higher than this plain.

DEER, a famous abbey of Cistercian monks, now in ruins, near the burgh of Bamff, in the shire of the latter name. It was founded by William Cuming, earl of Buchan.

Of the same name is a town on the river Ugy, in the same shire of Scotland, which is the seat of a presbytery, containing 13 parishes.

DEGERBY, a well-situated staple-town of Finland, in Sweden, on the bay of Finland, with a commodious harbour. In 1745, in consequence of the boundary marked by the last treaty of peace, it was made a frontier town upon the Russian jurisdiction, and called so from the noble demense of the same name, on which it is built; but in 1752, the king of Sweden called it Louisa. Here is a post-house.

DEHEURDD, a village of Cardiganshire, in S. Wales, with a fair on May 9.

DEHUNE, one of the rivers rising in Burgundy, in France; it runs into the Saone.

DEINE, or DEUME, a river which falls into the Pregel, not far from Wehlau, in the kingdom of Prussia.

DEINSE, a small fortified city of Flanders, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Lys. Brigadier Francis Fergus d'Offarle, Colonel of a Scots regiment, who commanded a strong garrison put there in 1695, surrendered himself prisoner of war at the first approach of the French, for which he was broke.

DEIRA, anciently one of the 2 kingdoms of the Northumbrians, lying S. of Tyne. Bernicia was the other.

DELAS, or DULAS, a river in Brecknockshire, which runs into the Irwon or Yron, below Longamarch.

DELAWAR, a river in Pennsylvania, in N. America. It rises far N. in the country of the Iroquois, and running S. divides this province from New Jersey, after which it falls into the Atlantic ocean, between the capes of May and Henlopen. It is navigable for upwards of 200 miles; but has a water-fall above Bristol, so that it is impracticable N. of the county of Bucks. In this river the Americans had a great naval force destroyed by the British forces, May 8, 1778.

DELBURGH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia, and in the bishopric of Paderborn, near the source of the river Ens.

DELFINO, the best town of all Epirus, or modern province of Albania, in European Turkey. It is the residence of the Turkish governor, and lies near Mount Pindus.

DELFS-HAVEN, a beautiful village of Holland, one of the United Provinces on the Maes, about 2 miles from Rotterdam and 8 from Delft, to the S. E. with which it has a communication by a canal.

DELFT, in Latin, Delphi, or Delphium, a large city of Holland, one of the United Provinces; it has a wall and wet ditch, being above 2 miles in circuit. Here are 2 beautiful streets lying parallel for a mile, with rows of trees and canals. Its trade is inconsiderable, being the retreat of the most wealthy merchants. In the old palace of Delft, William I. prince of Orange was murdered, and in the new church is an elegant monument for him, erected by the states. In the old church are the monuments of Van Tromp and Van Heine, two Dutch admirals killed at sea. In this town is the principal magazine of the province of Holland; and it is famous for its earthen ware, which takes the name of this city. Lat 52, 16, N. Long. 4, 15, E.

DELFTZYL, or DELFTZYL-SCANS, a strong place in Groningen, one of the Seven United Provinces, on the Damster-diep or Fivel. Its harbour exceeds that of Embden. It is surrounded with ramparts and 7 bastions, and defended by a citadel. In 1672, 14 Dutch East India ships escaped hither with rich cargoes from the English fleet. It lies 2 miles from Dam to the N. E. at the mouth of the river Ems.

DELGOVITIA, a Roman station, supposed to be Weighton, in Yorkshire; where Roman, as well as British antiquities, were found.

DELICHI, the famous river Acheron, in Albania, a province of Turkey in Europe, of which the

the ancient poets make such frequent mention.

DELLY, a province of the Hither India, in Asia. It is bounded by Bencab and Jamba on the N. Becar on the E. E. Agra on the S. and Indostan Proper on the W.

DELLY, the capital of the last-mentioned province of the same name, and of all the Hither India. It is a large populous city, about 9 or 10 miles in circuit, on the river Gemina. Here the Great Mogul resided; when Kouli Khan invaded his dominions, and was kept prisoner with his nobles and generals, till the conqueror forced them to deliver up all their riches. Not satisfied with this, he put many of their great men to the rack, upon his disappointment.

This cruel usage gave occasion to an insurrection; the invader was prompted to plunder the city, and massacre a great number of the inhabitants. After which he released the Mogul, and obliged him to transfer some of the provinces of India lying contiguous to Persia, to that crown. Kouli Khan returned with immense treasure, principally in diamonds, the produce of the mines of Golconda; which the famous Aurengzebe, had taken from the king of that country, and expelled him from his throne, about a century before this expedition of Kouli Khan. It lies 142 miles N. of Agra, and 339 S. of Lahor. Lat. 28, 12, N. Long. 79, 26, E.

DELMENHOST, a territory of Westphalia, in German, lying S. E. of Bremen, from 17 miles long to 7 broad.

Of the same name is its capital on the Delm, and fortified with a castle. It lies 12 miles W. of Bremen city, and subject to Denmark. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 8, 14, E.

BELMONT, a town in the Saltsgow, and circle of Suabia, in Germany, with a strong castle, sometimes the residence of the bishop of Basil; and the seat of his chapter, which was formerly at Friburg, is now settled here.

DELOS, an island of the Archipelago, very famous in ancient history. Originally it is said to have been a floating-island, but afterwards it became fixed and immoveable. It was held sacred, on account of its being the birth-place of Apollo and Diana. Anciently this island was governed by its own kings. Virgil mentions one Anius reigning here, in the time of the Trojan war. The Persians allowed the Delians to enjoy their ancient liberties, after they had reduced the rest of the Grecian islands.

In after ages the Athenians made themselves masters of it; and held it till they were driven out by Mithridates the Great, who plundered the rich temple of Apollo, and obliged the Delians to side with him. Mithridates was in his turn driven out by the Romans, who granted the inhabitants many privileges, and exempted them from all sorts of taxes. At present it is quite abandoned; the lands being covered with ruins and rubbish, in such a manner as to be quite incapable of cultivation. The inhabitants of Mycone hold it now, and pay but 10 crowns land-tax to the Grand Signior for an island which was once one of the richest in the world. At present there is no river in the island, but one of the noblest springs in the world; being 12 paces in diameter, and inclosed partly by rocks, and partly by a wall. Mount Cynthus, whence Apollo had the surname of Cynthus, is near the city. It is but one block of granite of the ordinary sort, cut, on that side which faces the city, into regular steps, and inclosed on both sides by a wall. On the top of the mountain are still to be seen, the remains of a stately building, with a Mosaic pavement, many broken pillars, and other valuable monuments of antiquity.

The city of Delos, as is manifest from the magnificent ruins still extant, took up that spacious plain reaching from one coast to the other. It was well peopled, and the richest city in the Archipelago, especially after the destruction of Corinth; merchants flocking thither from all parts, both in regard of the immunity they enjoyed there, and of the convenient situation of the place between Europe and Asia. Strabo calls it one of the most frequented empories in the world; and Pliny tells us, that all the commodities of Europe and Asia were sold, purchased, or exchanged there. It contained many noble and stately buildings; as the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Latonia; the porticoes of Philip of Macedon, and Dionysius Eutyches; a gymnasium, an oval basin made at an immense expence, for the representations of sea-fights; and a most magnificent theatre. The temple of Apollo was, according to Plutarch, begun by Erychton the son of Cecrops. The trunk of the famous statue of Apollo, mentioned by Strabo and Pliny, is still an object of great admiration to travellers. It is without head, feet, arms, or legs; but from the parts that are yet remaining, it plainly appears, that the ancients did not exaggerate when they commended it as a wonder of art.

So very sacred was the island of Delos held by the ancients, that no hostilities were practised here, even by the nations that were at war with one another, when they happened to meet in this place. Hence this island was a general asylum, and the protection extended to all kinds of living creatures; for this reason it abounded with hares, no dogs being suffered to enter it. No dead body was suffered to be buried in it, nor was any woman suffered to lie-in there; all dying persons, and women ready ready to be delivered, were carried over to the neighbouring island of Rhenæa.

DELPHI, or DELPHOS, the modern Castri, in Livadia, or the ancient Achaia, a province of European Turkey. It lies 2 miles to the N. of the gulph of Lepanto, upon a rugged rock, and is no more than a mean place, consisting of 200 houses: but was formerly a very celebrated city, on account of the temple and oracle of Apollo here: also for the dark cave from which the Pythian priestess pronounced her sentences. It lies on the side of Mount Parnassus, about 10 miles N. of the gulph of Lepanto.

DELSBERG, or DESBERG, a town in the diocese of Basil, in Switzerland, 20 miles S. W. of Basil city, and subject to the United Cantons. Lat. 47, 54, N. Long. 7, 56, E.

DELTA, is a part of Lower Egypt, which takes up a considerable space of ground between the branches of the Nile and the Mediterranean sea: the ancients called it the Isle of Delta, because it is in the shape of a triangle, like the Greek letter of that name. It is about 120 miles along the coast from Damietta to Alexandria, and 70 on the sides from the place where the Nile begins to divide itself. It is the most plentiful country of all Egypt, and it rains more there than in other parts, but the fertility is chiefly owing to the inundation of the river Nile. The principal towns on the coast are; Damietta, Rosetta, and Alexandria; but, within land, Menoufia and Maala, or Elmala.

DEMASS, the ancient Thapsus, on the sea coast of the ancient Byzacium, or the Winter Circuit of the present kingdom of Tunis, is situated upon a low neck of land, 3 miles E. by S. of To-bulba. The great extent of ruins maketh it the most considerable city on this side Carthage.

DEMATA, one of the harbours in the island of Santa Maura, in the Ionian sea, and European Turkey, belonging to the Venetians.

DEMER, a river of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, on which stands the city of Mechlin.

DEMERARY, a river of Guiana, in North America, on which the Dutch have formed a valuable settlement. See SURINAM.

DEMETRIUS, or DEMETRIADA, formerly an archiepiscopal city of Thessaly, now Janna, in European Turkey. It stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, anciently Anaurus, on the N. shore of Volo-gulph, or Armiro-gulph, the ancient Sinus Pelagicus, or Pegasus. It lies about 30 miles from Larissa on the S.

DEMETRIOWITZ, a soldier-town, in the generalate of Slavonia, and Hungarian Illyria, on the Save, in the neighbourhood of which is kept a regiment of horse for the defence of the frontiers. Here was the site of the anciently celebrated Sirmia, the Illyrian capital.

Of the former name is a town of Severfski, and the Western Muscovy, on the river Ugra, about 40 leagues S. E. of Smolensko.

DEMIANSK, a bourg of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, on a mountain on the river Irtysh, mostly inhabited by carriers, who in summer bring goods and passengers in boats on the river to and from this place; but in winter on sledges.

DEMFALVA, a bourg of the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, which gives its name to a celebrated cavern here.

DEMERLATA, a small village about a league to the S. W. of Adrianople, where Charles XII. resided some years, before he removed to Demotica.

DEMIKARPI, that is, the Iron-gate, commonly called Cataractæ Danubii, in Servia and Turkish Illyria. The country is so called, where the Danube runs through a strait between mountains, and over a craggy bottom. The swellings and whirlpools occasioned by the violence of the variously agitated stream, tosses ships so, that there is a necessity for having a skilful pilot, to come safely through this dangerous place. The hazard is still greater when coming upwards. In 1737 the Imperialists were obliged to sink their ships of war here, as not being able to sail upwards with them for want of a wind. Anciently this narrow pass, it is said, had an iron chain across it; and hence comes its name.

DEMMIN, an ancient town of Germany, in the duchy of Stetin, subject to Sweden, and seated on the river Peen. Long. 14, 45, E. Lat. 54, 3, N.

DEMONA, or DEMINO, VAL DI, one of the 3 provinces called valleys, in the kingdom of Sicily, in Lower Italy. It extends from Capo di Faro, as far as the river Termini. Its capital is Messina.

DEMOTICA, or DYDYMOTYCHUS, a town of Romania, in Turkey in Europe, on the river Maritz, where Charles XII. of Sweden continued a long while, in the year 1713. Here resides a Greek metropolitan.

DENAIN, a village of French Flanders, between Valenciennes and Bouchain, not far from the Schelde. Here is a collegiate church. It became famous for a victory obtained at this place by the French over the allies in 1712.

DENBERRY, in Devonshire, S. W. of Newton-Bushel, with a fair on September 8.

DENBIGH, the capital of a shire of the same name in North Wales, seated on the side of a rocky hill, on a branch of the river Clwyd, 27 miles miles to the W. of Chester, and 209 to the N. W. of London. It was formerly walled all round, and secured by a castle, which was looked upon as almost impregnable, by virtue of its advantageous situation. The town in its present state is moderately large, well built, and populous, principally inhabited by tanners and glovers, who carry on here a very considerable trade. It sends one member to parliament, and is governed by 2 aldermen, 2 bailiffs, and 25 capital burghesses, with other inferior officers. Its weekly markets are Wednesdays, and fairs on the 3d of May, the 15th of July, and 24th of September.

DENBIGHSHIRE, in Welch Sir Dhinbeck, one of the 6 counties in North Wales. It is bounded on the S. by Montgomeryshire; on the W. by those of Merioneth and Carnarvon, from which last it is divided by the river Conway; on the E. by Shropshire and Cheshire; and on the N. it has the Irish sea and Flintshire. From N. E. to S. W. it measures 40 miles; and from N. to S. 21; containing about 410,000 acres. In it are reckoned 57 parishes, 4 market-towns, and 38,000 inhabitants, particularly in the diocese of Bangor, and partly in that of St. Asaph. It enjoys a salubrious, but sharp, air. The W. part is heathy and barren, except the tract towards the sea; and the E. part is equally sterile, except towards the river Dee; but its middle part, which is a level of 17 miles from N. to S. and about 5 broad, called the Vale of Clwyd, through which this river runs, is fruitful, and much inhabited by gentry. On one side it lies open to the sea; and on the other hemmed in with high hills; from one of which springs the aforesaid Clwyd, which, after fetching a compass to the S. E. runs N. by Ruthin, and not far from the town of Denbigh, entering Flintshire before it reaches the Irish sea. The other most considerable rivers are, the Elwy, the Dee, and the Conway. The principal commodities here, besides goats and sheep, with black cattle, is rye, commonly called amel-corn, produced in the heathy parts by the manure of turf-ashes, the common fuel in this shire. Here are several lead-mines, particularly the earl of Powis's. This country gives title to a branch of the Fielding family, and sends but 2 members to parliament, namely, one for the shire, and the other for the county-town of Denbigh.

DENDERMONDE, a strong town of Flanders, in the Austrian Netherlands, in Latin Tenera Munda. It lies at the mouth of the Dender, and its junction with the Schelde. By means of sluices, the neighbouring country may be laid under water: for which reason, Lewis IV. when besieging it with an army of 50,000 men, was obliged to retire with the utmost precipitation in 1667. It lies in a marshy bottom, 14 miles E. of Ghent; and was taken by the allies in 1706. Lat. 51, 16, E. Long. 3, 56, N.

DENIA, (city of,) in Valencia, in Spain; it is called in Latin Dianeum Artemisium, from Diana, in honour of whom it was built; also Hemerocopium, from a high watch-tower. It lies at the foot of Mount Mongon, on the declivity of a hill reaching to the sea. From a very high tower, here ships may be seen a pretty way off at sea. In this place is a castle strongly fortified both by art and nature, and a double harbour pretty commodious. The town gives title of marquis. It lies opposite to the isle of Ivica, and 36 miles S. of Valencia. Lat. 39, 12, N. Long. 26, W.

DENMARK, one of the northern kingdoms of Europe, was anciently called Dania. The German Ocean separates it from Great Britain on the W. the Scaggerac Sea from Norway on the N. and the Sound from Sweden on the E. It is bounded on the S. by Germany and the Baltic. The extent of it is the less easily ascertained, from the very irregular position of its several parts. Geographers commonly divide it into Jutland, the duchy of Sleswic, the duchy of Holstein, and the islands at the entrance of the Baltic. All these together constitute the kingdom of Denmark; yet it is remarkable, that not any one of them is separately called by that name.

It is a very singular circumstance, that the king of Denmark has not a navigable river in all his dominions. The Eyder is not by any means adapted to ships of burthen; and the Elbe is rather one of the confines or boundaries, than an inland river of this kingdom. There are here some lakes, which afford great abundance of fresh-water fish, and the forests are well stocked with game of all sorts, as stags, elks, wild boars, hares, and plenty of wild fowl.

The air of North-Jutland is cold and piercing. On the east-side in South-Jutland, as well as in the islands of Funen and Zealand, it is milder and more temperate; but in the low marshy parts, and in the isle of Laaland, the air is thick, moist, and unhealthy. The shifting of the winds, indeed, renders the weather somewhat variable; but at the same time purges the atmosphere of fogs and vapours. The west wind is the most violent, and blows very frequently in these parts. Denmark is chiefly situated on a level, and, excepting the tract of land about the middle of Jutland, is very fertile; so that the country maintains its inhabitants in plenty, and yields a rich provision of every thing necessary for the support of human life. It can better dispense with horned cattle and horses, than with any sort of grain. The climate is not in general so frigid as in some parts of Germany situated ated much more to the south. This may arise from the adjacent sea, the vapours of which dissolve the nitrous particles brought by the wind from the northern latitudes, before they reach this region; by which means the inclemency of the sky is much abated. The gentle breezes blowing from the sea continue also to make the air cooler in summer. The year in these parts properly consists only of two seasons, winter and summer, spring and autumn not being commonly known. During the 3 months of June, July, and August, the heat is much more intense than in England, and very sultry in the night. But it is a close and disagreeable heat; the thickness of the atmosphere even tinges the beams of the sun with a deepness and gloom extremely offensive to the eye. In Copenhagen, during these months, the plague of the fly, as it is there called, is extremely troublesome. These the inhabitants endeavour to destroy by a poisonous water; the effects of which are so certain, that on sprinkling it in their kitchens and chambers, bushels of dead insects may be swept together in one room.

The latest and most accurate calculations of the number of the inhabitants in the kingdom of Denmark, excluding those in the Greenland and Iceland, make the whole amount to 2,444,000. However disproportionate this number may seem to the extent of the Danish territories, the uncultivated condition of the latter renders it highly probable; and it is more than sufficient for all the purposes of commerce. Population in these modern times generally keeps pace with plenty, especially in northern countries; the number of his Danish majesty's subjects must therefore be greatly increased by the improvements lately introduced into agriculture and other arts. This part of Europe, however, is thought by some to have been much more populous formerly than it is at present.

The Danes are divided into nobles, burghers, and peasants; and the noblesse are distinguished by the appellation of the higher and lower nobility. There never were any princes or dukes, except the king's sons, in Denmark, one nobleman excepted, Knut Pors, who was created duke of Halland by Christopher II. so that the rank of higher nobles included only counts and barons, which titles were introduced by Christian V. The privileges of counts are many and great. They have the right of primogeniture. Their younger sons and daughters are styled barons and baronesses, and possess all the dignity annexed to that rank. In their counties or baronies they exercise the right of patronage, and appoint a judge and secretary, from whose sentence there is no appeal but to the supreme court of judicature. They pay no contributions or tithes for their hereditary estates; and are allowed 300 acres of land free from all taxation or impost. All suits carried on against them must commence in the supreme judicature. They bear a coronet over their coat of arms. Barons are distinguished by nearly the same immunities; but enjoy only 100 acres of land exempted from tithes and contributions, and are something inferior in rank and title. No person is made a feudal count or baron who is not able to purchase so much land as may be changed into a feudal county or barony. But this qualification is not requisite to the lower nobility, who in matters of life and honour can only be cited before the king's supreme court.

There are two orders of knighthood; that of Dannebrogue, which is said to be of the highest antiquity; and that of the Elephant, which was instituted by Christian I. in honour of his son's marriage, and is conferred only on persons of the first quality and most extraordinary merit. The number of the members which constitute this most honorary order, besides the sovereign, is only 30.

The burghers in this country enjoy greater or less privileges according to the cities of which they are members, their extent of property, or personal deserts. Those of Copenhagen have some peculiar distinctions, which are said to be very extraordinary and extensive. They obtained them in 1650, and had them both confirmed and considerably enlarged in 1661.

The Danish peasants are of different classes. Some possess a spot of land as their own property, for which they pay to the lord of the manor an inconsiderable acknowledgment: they are otherwise exempted from all exactions, excepting the general contribution. These are called landowners. Those who have only a farm, pay for the profits of it at a stipulated rent in money, cattle, or corn, once a-year, and do inferior service for a certain number of days at the manor, and pleasure of their landlords. There are still others who act as servants to these 2 classes of peasants. Slavery, or the state of servitude, was abolished for the most part in this nation by Frederick IV. in the year 1702, and is continued only in some parts of the duchy of Sleswick.

In the times of heathenism, the Danes paid religious homage chiefly to their gods, Freyer, Thor, Thyr, Odin, and Freya; and in the language of the country, 4 days of the week still retain the names of the 4 last-mentioned deities. Many attempts were made in the middle ages at several times, and by various princes, to propagate the Gospel in this kingdom. Some monks having succeeded as missionaries for this purpose in the year 822, are said to have erected the first Christian church in the duchy of Sleswick; but almost all the subsequent kings were inveterate enemies to this holy institution, and persecuted the abettors of it with unparalleled cruelty. Christianity, however, with her usual patience and magnanimity, here as in every other place, ultimately surmounted all opposition; and finally triumphing, after various struggles, obtained at length a liberal and legal toleration. When Luther began to restore in Germany the great truths of Revelation in all their genuine purity and excellence, his honest and manly endeavours met with a most general and favourable reception in Denmark. The Lutheran is therefore the present prevailing religion of this kingdom, in which it gained the sanction of a national establishment by the diet held at Copenhagen in 1537. The ecclesiastical government is divided into 6 dioceses; one in Zealand, another in Funen, and 4 in Jutland. The government of these is committed to bishops, or superintendants of the church and clergy.

Men of eminence in the republic of letters are as frequent and numerous here as in any other European state of a similar extent. Indeed, there is scarcely any branch of literature, or any particular science, in which individuals in this kingdom have not acquitted themselves with credit. The climate, however, seems to form an invincible obstacle to the progress and improvement of what we call polite learning and the fine arts. Indeed, says Mr. Wrexall, I apprehend the year is more properly divided here into summer and winter, than with us into 4 seasons. A short summer succeeds to the long series of cold and darkness, which environs them from October till April; and during that period they often experience very great heats for a few days, or sometimes weeks. Certainly man is much affected by physical causes; and one is not surprised to find the elegant arts confined to luxurious and southern climates; and faintly raising their heads amidst these snowy and inhospitable regions, where the inhabitants seem in some degree to partake of the asperities of the soil, and where royal munificence, however unbounded, can only raise a few sickly and straggling plants.

The Danish language, like the Norwegian, is a corruption of the Teutonic. The utterance of this unpolished dialect, which, like every other rude language, abounds in consonants, is peculiarly grating to the ear. The sound is harsh, and the natives articulate in a careless and drawling manner. High Dutch and French are, however, spoken at court. The nobility have also of late made great proficiency in English, which is publicly taught at Copenhagen, as a necessary branch of polite education.

The improvements going forward in every part of Denmark, render it very difficult to speak with any certainty concerning the manners and customs, the police and manufactures, peculiar to this nation. The people here do not avail themselves of all the advantages they enjoy by their situation for enlarging their trade. They have not even the face of industry or business, says the author quoted above; and Copenhagen, though one of the finest ports of the world, can boast of little commerce, which, however, is evidently in a state of improvement.

The police is singularly rigid and regular; Denmark is therefore seldom infested with those highway-robberies, burglaries, and various kinds of felonies, so common in other commercial countries. Murder and manslaughter often happen; and the punishment of the criminal guilty of such enormities, is decapitation. Here the public executioner, though (as in every other place) universally despised, is usually very rich; as he is the general contractor for emptying all jakes, removing all kinds of filth, and particularly dead domestic animals, which no other Dane would touch on any account. The Danish apothecaries are all under the most excellent and exemplary regulations. Only two are allowed in Copenhagen; and only one in all other towns of importance. They are severally licensed by the college of physicians, and confirmed by the king. They are also bound by certain penalties to keep an exact register of the drugs they sell; by whom prescribed, and to whom administered.

There are many artists of extraordinary skill at Copenhagen; and every branch of mechanics is at present well executed in Denmark. Gold and silver lace, silk stuffs, and velvets, linen, cotton, and woollen cloths, stuffs, stockings, tapestry, hats, bastard and genuine porcelain, and fire-arms of all kinds, are manufactured in this kingdom. Here are also paper and copper mills, different sorts of iron-ware, both silk and cotton printing-houses, and several manufactories of soap, starch, glue, lacquer, tobacco, sugar, and steel. No foreign articles of these kinds can be legally imported; and the wear of jewels, gold and silver stuff, or foreign lace, has been some time prohibited. Not long ago, a general warehouse or magazine was opened by authority in the metropolis, to which manufacturers bring all the goods they have not been able to sell in other towns, and are paid ready money for them. From this great store-house all sorts of vendible commodities are constantly delivered out to retailers on credit.

Denmark enjoys the most commodious situation for navigation; and by establishing a general mart or staple in Copenhagen, might be made the center of

of all the northern trade, especially of that carried on in the Baltic. Formerly, all the commerce in this country was carried on by the Hanse towns, which were afterwards supplanted by the Dutch and English; but chiefly by the former. In process of time, the Danes understood the advantages of abandoning all neutral bottoms, and using their own. Frederick IV. may be called the real founder of the Danish commerce, which Christian VI. powerfully supported, and Frederick V. very much encouraged by his royal munificence and bounty.

The royal revenue arises from impositions made at the king's pleasure on his own subjects, from the duties paid by foreigners, and from his own demefne lands, including all sorts of mulcts and confiscations. Wine, salt, tobacco, and every kind of luxury, are all moderately taxed. Marriages, paper, corporations, land, houses, and poll-money, raise a considerable sum. The expences of fortifications are defrayed by the people; and when the king's daughter is married, they contribute 100,000 rix-dollars towards her portion. But the internal taxes in this country are very uncertain, as they are uniformly raised or lessened at the king's will. Customs, and tolls on exports and imports, are more stable. The tolls paid by strangers arise chiefly from foreign ships passing through the Sound into the Baltic, by the narrow strait which runs between Schonen and the island of Zealand. These tolls are in proportion to the size of the ship and value of the cargo, exhibited in bills of lading. This tax, which forms an essential part of his Danish majesty's revenue, has more than once thrown the northern nations of Europe into a flame. It was often disputed by the English and Dutch; and the Swedes, who commanded the opposite side of the pass, for some time refused to pay it; but in the treaty of 1720 between these two rival states, under the guaranty of his Britannic majesty George I. the Swedes agreed to pay the same rates which are paid by the subjects of Great Britain and the Netherlands. This toll is paid at Elsenore, a town seated on the Sound at the entrance of the Baltic, and about 18 miles distant from Copenhagen. The Danes also claim a right to the toll of the Weser, which is exacted of all ships which navigate on that river, except those of Prussia. It is paid at Elsfleet, and amounts to about 40,000 l. No estimate can be made of the toll at Elsenore, nor of the gross revenue of Denmark: though it is generally thought to be at present not less than 700,000 l. a-year; a sum which in this frugal country is abundantly competent to the maintenance of a splendid court, and powerful armaments both by sea and land.

The 3 last kings of Denmark, notwithstanding the degeneracy of their people in martial affairs, were very respectable princes, by the number and discipline of their troops, to which they paid an unremitting attention. The present army of this kingdom in time of peace consists of 30,000 cavalry and infantry, exclusive of militia; but in time of war, they have mustered near 50,000 regulars. The naval force of Denmark has lately been cultivated and extended so considerably, that it now ranks as a maritime power. Indeed, the fisheries all along the coasts, especially of the northern parts of Norway, afford great numbers of excellent seamen. Every sea-faring man being obliged once in his life, when called upon, to serve his king and country for 6 years, and for that purpose is registered. The 6 years being expired, no more service is required of him. The number of seamen in Denmark and Norway thus registered amounts to 20,000 men. Besides these, there is always a body of 4000 sailors regimented for sudden occasions, and in constant pay, at Copenhagen.

The form of government in Denmark was originally the same established by the Goths and Vandals wherever they extended their conquests. Whether it was anciently an elective or hereditary kingdom seems yet undetermined, as both sides of the question are espoused by historians of equal reputation. Admitting the crown to be hereditary, it is nevertheless certain, that the states commonly made their choice out of the royal family, and that they also on some occasions departed from this custom.

The present despotism of Denmark is grafted on the ruins of that aristocratic power which the nobility exercised over their inferiors with the most insufferable arrogance and inhumanity.

In 1660, the whole nation was in a most calamitous situation. A peace not very honourable succeeded a most unfortunate war. The treasury was so much exhausted, that on disbanding the troops, there was no money to pay up their arrears. The soldiers then became insolent and licentious. The power of the nobles had lately risen to an enormous height; and their haughtiness and rapacity extended with their power. The clergy, for want of importance, were discontented and chagrined at the obloquy and disrespect to which they found themselves reduced. The peasantry, irritated and made desperate by the oppressive taxes occasioned by a long, expensive, and abortive war, were turbulent and unmanageable. These and other alarming circumstances rendered an immediate convention of the states indispensable. Here the commons proposed that an equitable tax should be laid on all without distinction, in proportion to their circumstances. This was strenuously and resolutely resolutely opposed by the nobles, who asserted their hereditary privileges as a full exemption from every kind of impost. The other party had recourse to the great law of nature, which they contended was superior and prior to all prescription; and urged with unanswerable force the unalienable extent of their natural rights. They stated, as the fundamental principle of the proposition before them, that it was incumbent on those who engrossed the largest share of the lands, wealth, and honours of the kingdom to bear an equal proportion of the common burden, and contribute accordingly to the general defence. This mode of reasoning was too convincing to produce any other effect than silence or fury; and the consequence of a disagreement between the interests and convictions of men is easily foreseen. Tenacious alike of their real and imaginary claims, both parties were highly inflamed against each other. In the midst of this violent ferment, One Otto Craig, a nobleman more intrepid than prudent, boldly told the commons, that they neither understood the rights of the nobility, who were their masters, nor their own, who were no more than slaves. These degrading expressions proved like oil to a furnace, and threw the whole assembly into one blaze. The speaker of the commons, fired with indignation, swore a solemn oath that the nobility should certainly repent the contempt with which they had treated them. The term slavery operated like a watch-word concerted between the burghers, the clergy, and the court. The assembly broke up in a rage; and the commons, under the auspices of their leader, adjourned to the Brewers-hall, where it was instantly and unanimously resolved to make the king a solemn tender of their liberties and service, and to establish in his family an hereditary succession to the crown. This resolution was executed next day. The bishop of Copenhagen officiated as speaker for the clergy and commons. The king thankfully accepted their grant, and promised immediate relief and protection. The gates of the metropolis were shut; and the nobility, finding themselves divested of all their late hereditary consequence, submitted with the best grace they could, to confirm the king's supremacy and their own insignificance.

Thus from motives of revenge, probably fomented by artful and designing courtiers, the people, with a rude and daring temerity, resigned their independence for ever, and in one fatal moment, changed the whole face of affairs, made the crown hereditary, and the king absolute. It is happy for the Danes, that ever since the year 1660, when this memorable revolution took place, few or no instances have occurred of abusing the despotic powers thus vested in the crown, which are at present, perhaps, more unlimited than those of any other monarch in Europe.

The code of Danish laws is so peculiarly perspicuous and concise, that the whole is comprised in one volume. This celebrated work, which discovers an amazing fund of legislative wisdom, is composed with infinite simplicity, and written in the native language of the country. It is divided into 6 books, and treats clearly, though briefly, of the procedure of the courts of justice; of ecclesiastical laws; of official and honorary law; of maritime and naval law; of property law; and of criminal law.

By means of a system thus formed on principles at once the most obvious and the most equitable, the lowest and least intelligent easily understand their duty; and, when either injured or accused, are enabled to plead their own cause.

DENNIS-ISLE, or Gerret, is one of the islands off the N. E. coast of New Britain, in the antarctic or southern countries. It is about 14 or 15 leagues in circuit, being high, mountainous, and woody; the coast is well-stored with cocoa-trees. It is very populous and well-cultivated in several places. It shoots out in many points into the sea, between which are sandy bays. The natives are very black, and active fellows in their prowess. Their weapons are principally lances, slings, some bows and arrows, with wooden fishgigs for striking of fish.

DENIS, (St.) Fanum St. Dionysii, anciently Catolacum, or Catulliacum, a town in the Isle of France, situated in a fruitful plain. It owes its origin to a celebrated Benedictine abbey here, formed in 600 by king Clotarius II. improved by his son Dagobert, and others afterwards. The abbey-buildings are of very beautiful free-stone, with a regular garden. The church, though of Gothic architecture, is fine, and contains not only a rich treasury, among which are kept the crown jewels; but it is the burying-place of the French kings and their families, from Dagobert and the Capet race downwards to this day, of which here are several fine monuments. In this abbey-church is likewise buried the celebrated Constable of France, Bertrand du Guesclin, and Marshal Turenne. Since 1692, this convent has had no more abbots; for after the death of cardinal Retz, who was the last of them, its income, amounting to 100,000 livres, was given to the house of St. Cyr, the favourite foundation of madam Maintenon, the French king's mistress. Its present revenue is 60,000 livres. Besides this church, here are 13 others, among which is the collegiate church of St. Paul, and 5 cloisters more. St. Denis lies six miles north of Paris.

DENOCK, or DAVOCK, a river in Cumberland which runs into the lake below Dalegarth.

DENOON, the principal place of Cowal, a subdivision of Argyleshire, in the middle partition of Scotland. It is noted as having been formerly the seat of the bishop of Argyle, and now of a presbytery, consisting of 8 parishes.

DENT, a river in Westmoreland, which runs into the Lune below Killington.

DENYS, (St.) a town of France, in Lower Languedoc, and in the diocese of Carcassone.

DENYS D'ANJOU, a town of France, in Anjou, 3 miles from the river Sarthe, and in the election of Chateau-Gontier.

DENYS DE CANDE, a town of France, in Anjou, in the election of Angers.

DENYS LE GAST, (St.) a town of France, in Normandy and the diocese of Coutances.

DEOLS, or BOURG-DEOLS, also BOURG-DIEUX, a town of Lower Berry in France, upon the river Indre. It had formerly 3 parish-churches, and a celebrated abbey. Of the churches there are 2 still remaining, and only one of these a parish-church; of the abbey, there is a chapel only standing.

DEPTFORD, 4 miles from London, in the county of Kent, had its name from the depth of its ford over the river Ravensbourn, before its bridges were erected. Though it has no market, yet it is divided into the Upper and Lower towns, containing above 1900 houses, and 2 churches, the newest of which was one of the 50 built by commissioners pursuant to act of parliament. Here is a settled corporation, for the use of the seamen, something like a college, under stile of The Trinity-house of Deptford-Strond; but without the least share of trust or authority in the navy. Here is a foundation belonging to the said corporation, and built by them, at different times, in 2 places not contiguous. The old part contains 21 houses, and the new 38, for decayed pilots or masters of ships, or their widows, the men allowed 20s. the women 16s. per month. But what this place is most noted for is its noble dock, which is of more than 200 years standing. Though the biggest ships are built at Woolwich, yet here is so much business that the whole area of the yard is lately enlarged by more than double than what it was. It has a wet dock of 2 acres for ships, and another of an acre and a half for masts; besides additional store-houses, dwelling-houses, launches, &c. one of which (the victualling-office,) built in 1745, was by accident burnt down in January 1748-9, with a great quantity of provisions and other stores.

Here are the officers continually residing for the service of the navy, as at Woolwich, Chatham, Portsmouth, &c. The little ship in which Sir

Francis Drake sailed round the world was, by queen Elizabeth's order, laid up in dock here for a monument. Here are likewise docks for refitting and building East India ships, and at the king's moorings off the town, where ships out of commission lay in ordinary, they deliver their cargoes, as do very large West Indiamen. The Red-house was a noted collection of ware houses and store-houses, built of red bricks, for many sorts of merchandize, till consumed in July 1739, by such a dreadful fire that nothing could be saved. It also has been burnt twice since.

This town, which was called West Greenwich, bids very fair soon to be called E. Rotherhithe; for though the distance from it to Rotherhithe used to be reckoned at least 2 miles, and that over marshes, unlikely ever to be inhabited, yet now, what with the buildings, docks, &c. on the Thames side, between both places, it is, in a manner, joined to Rotherhithe.

DERAS, a large town of Asia, in Persia. Long. 61, 55, E. Lat. 31, 32, N.

DERBE, a city on the S. limits of Lycaonia, a province of Asia Minor, or Asiatic Turkey. It was an episcopal see under the metropolitan of Iconium and patriarchate of Constantinople.

DERBENT, a strong city of Schirwan (Dagistan) a province of Persia, in Asia; the Turks call it Demir Capi, or the Iron Gate, in Latin Portæ Ferreæ. It was always a place of importance, and is a strong pass from Muscovy and Tartary into Persia, for which it is principally considerable. It stands on the W. coast of the Caspian sea, the site of the city taking up the whole defile between that and the craggy mountains on the frontiers of Georgia. On the side of the sea is a stone-wall. The citadel joins the town, and consists of large free-stone. The coast is all rock, by which it is rendered dangerous to shipping. The Muscovites took this place in 1723, and it was ceded to them in 1735, by virtue of a treaty with Kouli Khan, of Persia. Lat. 42, 6, N. Long. 52, 2, E.

DERBY, a town in Newhaven county Connecticut.

DERBY, a town of Pennsylvania, in Chester county.

DERBY, or DARBY, the capital town of the shire of its own name, on the W. bank of the river Derwent, with a stone-bridge over it. The river has been made navigable into the Trent. Here several gentlemen's families reside. Upon the Derwent is Sir Thomas Lombe's curious engine by which organized or thrown silk is made, for a perfect model of which the parliament of Great Britain allowed him 14,000l. Derby is populous, but not considerable for trade. It is governed by a mayor, who returns 2 members to parliament. The tower of All-Saints church is a beautiful Gothic structure, 178 feet high, erected in queen Mary's reign at the charge of the maidens and batchelors of the town. Its weekly markets are on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. Its annual fairs hold on February 25, a meeting for cheese, Wednesday in Lent Affize-week for horses, now not frequented, Friday in Easter week for horned or black cattle, the first Friday in May, Friday in Whitsun-week, and July 25, for horned cattle, September 27, cheese fair, and Friday before Michaelmas a meeting by custom for horned cattle. It gives title of earl to the Stanley family; and in 1745 was the utmost limit of the Scots Highlander roving incursion into England, when a sudden panic struck them, and they precipitately returned into their own country, till they were utterly dispersed at Culloden. Derby lies 122 miles N. W. of London.

DERBYSHIRE, an inland county of England. It is bounded on the E. by Nottinghamshire and part of Leicestershire, which also bounds it on the S. it has Staffordshire and part of Cheshire on the W. and Yorkshire on the N. The river Erewash parts it from Nottinghamshire, the Trent from Leicestershire, the Trent and Dove from Staffordshire, and the Goyt from Cheshire. It contains 680,000 acres, 500 villages, 11 market-towns, and 127,000 inhabitants. Its rivers, of which the principal are the Dove and Derwent, abound with fish. In the former is a fish called Graylings, and likewise excellent trout. It rises in the Peak, and is subject to sudden inundations, but these very fertilizing. The Derwent also rises in the Peak.

This county is well stocked with pastures, grain, and wood, also gentlemen's seats; especially on its E. and S. sides. Here are likewise stone-quarries, mines of coal, iron, and lead, also alabaster and crystal. In the N. part is a tract of rugged mountains, called the Peak, containing several natural curiosities, the principal of which are commonly included in the 7 following particulars; Chatworth-house, Mount Mam-tor, Eden-hole, Buxton-wells, Weeding, or Tides-well, Pool's-hole, and the Devil's A— of Peak.

DEREHAM, or EAST-DEERHAM, a market-town of Norfolk. It has 2 annual fairs, on February 3, and September 28. It lies 15 miles from Norwich, and 97 from London.

DEREOTE, or DEIROUTE, a town of Africa, in Egypt, and in the isle formed by the canal which runs from Cairo to Rosetta, where there is a magnificent temple. Long. 31, 55, E. Lat. 30, 40, N.

DERNA, (coast of,) it is the same with Barca; which see.

DERNA, the only city on the Barcan coast, in Africa, is small, but well-situated; and a little way from the sea. It is watered with several springs. Its territory is fertile, but the haven and road are very inconvenient, except in fair weather.

DERNIS, formerly a considerable fortress, but now a mean town of Venetian Dalmatia and Hungarian Illyria, close by the river Cicola. In 1648 it was deserted by the Turks, and set on fire by the Venetians. Upon this the former took possession of it, but in 1684, they forsook it a second time.

DERPT, or as the inhabitants call it, DERPAT, and the Muscovites Junogorod, is a large and ancient city of Livonia, on the river Eimbeck, between the lakes Peibus and Wortzie, (which communicate by that river,) 60 miles from Narva to S. and 75 from Parnaw E. E. long. 27, 25; lat. 58, 0. It was formerly a bishop's see, and was adorned with an university in 1632, by Gustavus Adolphus, it being a pleasant healthy place, abounding with all necessaries; but it has since been removed to Parnaw. The buildings of Derpt are of stone and brick; but it is not so populous as it was. It has a strong castle on a hill. However the Teutonic knights took it from the Muscovites in 1280, the Poles seized it in 1582, the Swedes drove out them; in 1603 they regained and kept it till 1625, when the Swedes took it again; in 1704 it surrendered to the Muscovites, who have kept it ever since.

DERSAU, or DIRSCHAU, a fortified town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia. It stands on the Vistula. Here is a convent for Predicant monks. It has been thrice laid in ashes. The Swedes took it twice. Here a provincial court is held.

DERVENTIO, now Little Chester, an old Roman station, on the river Derwent, a mile below Derby. The remains of antiquities are daily dug up here, and at this place was anciently a bridge, the foundation of which may still be determined.

DERVENTES, a city in the time of the Romans, now the site of Auldby, on the S. side of the river Derwent, in Yorkshire. Here a company stiled Derventenfis was stationed.

DERWENT, a river of Derbyshire. It rises in the Peak, and ends in the river Trent. It is very rapid, and upon the least increase of its waters roars hideously, and rolls down sometimes prodigious pieces of rocks. It runs before the W. front of Chatworth-house.

Of the same name is a river in Yorkshire, very full of water, and subject to inundations always after rain. It abounds with fish, and runs between the E. and N. Ridings. The source of this river is in the hills called Derwent-fells where copper-mines were formerly worked.

DERWENT-WATER, a river of Cumberland, land, which after running through this country and forming several lakes, particularly a spacious one beyond Hay-castle, falls below Cockermouth into the Irish sea. From it the family of Ratcliff, took the title of earl.

DERWER, a river in Northumberland, which runs into the Tyne against Elswick.

DES, or DEES, a pretty town in the W. part of Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It stands at the confluence of the Great and Small Szamos, and is noted both for its salt-pits, and as the residence of count Bethlen Gabor.

DESAGNADERO, (El,) i. e. the drain, a river of La paz, and audience of Charcas, in S. America. It issues from the S. part of lake Titi-caca, afterwards forming lake Paria, which has no visible outlet; but its many whirlpools, indicate a subterraneous passage. Over Desagnadero still remains the famous bridge of rushes, invented by the fifth Ynca of Peru, Capuc Yupanqui, for transporting his army to the other side. The base of this bridge is 2 large cables, made of a kind of grass, laid across the river, and fascines of rushes securely fastened upon these, and the same materials repeated again across the former, so as to be level. The river here is between 80 and 100 yards in breadth, flowing very impetuously; though under a smooth surface. This bridge, about 5 yards broad, and one and a half above the surface of the water, is to this day carefully repaired or rebuilt every six months, by the natives of the neighbouring provinces.

DESCADA, DESIRADA, or DESIDERADA, the first of the Caribbee-islands discovered by Columbus in his second voyage, anno 1494, when he gave it that name. It is situated in the Atlantic ocean, E. from Guadaloupe, and subject to the French. The Spaniards make this in their way to America, sometimes, as well as Guadaloupe. It looks at a distance like a galley, with a low point at the N. W. end. Here are sand-hills on the N. end of it full of red veins. In some parts it is fruitful and well-cultivated; in others barren, and destitute of trees. It breeds guanas, and a multitude of the fowls called frigats, &c. Labat says there is a very deep cavern in this island which is almost full of bones, with the reliques of bows and other arms of the ancient Indians, and supposes it to have been a burying-place. It is 4 French leagues in length, but scarce 2 in breadth. Lat. 16, 36, N. Long. 61, 15, W.

DESEADA, or, as it is commonly called, Cape Desire, and the most westerly promontory of the Magellan Straits, at the extremity of S. America, and entrance into the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 53, 35, S. Long. 85, 15, W.

DESERZANO, a large and beautiful village of

Vol. I.—No. 39.

D E

Bresciano, a province of Venice, and in Upper Italy. It stands on lake Garda, and is famous both for its good wine and fine fish.

DESIRADA. See DESEADA.

DESIRE, (Cape,) on the E. side of Nova Zembla, in about lat. 76, 10.

DESOLATION-ISLAND, in Davis's Straits, lying off the Meta Incognita, and W. coast of Groenland.

DESSAW, a well-fortified town in the principality of the same name, belonging to the prince of Anhalt Dessaw, in Upper Saxony, in Germany. It stands in a fruitful country, at the influx of the Muldaw into the Elbe. Here the prince has a palace.

The trade of the town is in excellent beer, which is sent all over the country. It lies 64 miles N. W. of Dresden, and 24 N. of Leipzig. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 12, 52, E.

DESUNNY, a river in Merionethshire, which runs into the Irish sea near Sarrabugh-point.

DETMOLD, a town in the county of Lippe and circle of Westphalia, in Germany, where its own count resides; it is supposed to be the ancient Teuto Burgum. It lies 8 miles N. of Paderborn. Lat. 52, N. Long. 8, 35, E.

DETROIT, a town situated in N. America, on a river or strait of the same name, which runs from lake St. Claire, to lake Erie. It contains about 100 houses, and the streets are somewhat regular, with good barracks, a spacious parade and garden belonging to the governor. On the fortifications are mounted some cannon sufficient only for its defence against the Indians, who in the years 1765-6 besieged it a year without being able to reduce it. In March 19, 1763, it was dark the whole day which preceded a shower of rain, or rather sulphur and dirt, of the consistence of ink. The town was built by the French, and carries on a great trade with the Indians, but it was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, at the peace of Paris.

DETTINGEN, a village in the territory of Hanau and Upper Rhine, in Germany; where the British troops with the Hanoverians and Hessians, as auxiliaries to the queen of Hungary, and commanded by the elector of Hanover king of Great Britain, were attacked on June 16, 1743, in their march from Aschaffenburg to Hanau, by the best troops of France, under Marshal Noailles, who passed the Maine on purpose, as being sure of victory, the allies having been for 2 or 3 days in great want of provisions; but he was repulsed, and obliged to repass the river, after great part of his army had been cut off, both in the field and in their precipitate retreat. The king was that day in very eminent danger, for the French brought a battery to bear on the station where he was; but being levelled velled too high, the balls flew over his head. The duke of Cumberland was slightly wounded in the leg.

On the field of battle, his majesty, after the action, made several of his general officers Knights Bannerets, as was anciently the custom of princes, to distinguish merit they themselves had personally observed.

Dettingen is 6 miles W. of Aschaffenburg, and 12 E. of Hanau. Lat. 50, 12, N. Long. 7, 9, E.

DETTOR, a river in Cardiganshire, which runs into the Tyvy at Llandissil.

DEVA, in Latin Decidava, a spacious, well-built town of Huniad county (Coloswar) in Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It is surrounded with a wall: and near it is a castle standing on a high rock. It is noted for excellent wine, and guarding the pass of the Iron-gate into the Turkish dominions. It lies 28 miles S. of Wirtemberg.

DEVA, a river of Asturias, in Spain, at the mouth of which, in Guipuscoa, and province of Biscay, stands a town of the same name, with a harbour, on the Mediterranean. The latter is 38 miles E. of Bilbao. Lat. 43, 25, N. Long. 2, 18, W.

DEVEN, or DEBEN, a castle of Count Palffy's, in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands upon a mountain near the confluence of the Morave and Danube.

DEVENTER, the capital of Salland quarter, and of all Overijssel, one of the Seven United Provinces of Holland. It is a populous and large city, being well fortified, and stands in a country abounding with pasture and arable land. Here are 3 churches, one of which was formerly a cathedral; also 5 hospitals. The celebrated Erasmus had part of his education in their grammar school, now a schola illustris, with professors of philosophy, divinity, and Hebrew. Both ends of the bridge over the river rest upon piles, and the middle is supported with boats. Here is a fine quay. The city has 6 gates; and the Brink-port is adorned with statues and inscriptions. The round tower of Norenberg is a remarkable building for strength and neatness. In 1672 this city was betrayed to the bishop of Munster, when there was at least 10,000 fighting men in it. And in 1674 the bishop of Cologne, to whose share it fell, quitted it for 42,000 crowns, to save the fortifications and guns. It lies at the confluence of the rivulet Shipbeck with the Iffel, on the E. bank of the latter. It lies 6 miles N. of Zutphen. Lat. 52, 25, N. Long. 6, 5, E.

DEVERON, a fine river of Bamf-shire, in the middle division of Scotland, which traverses in serpentine meanders through this shire, till it empties itself into the Murray frith, at the town of Bamf.

DEVIL'S ARROWS or BOLTS, near Borough-bridge, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, are 3 huge stones set on end, in form of pyramids; so called by the vulgar: but the learned look upon them either as monuments of some signal victory, or as British deities, &c.

DEVIL'S-BRIDGE, a very high stone bridge, of one arch, about 5 leagues within Mount St. Gothard, and canton of Uri, in Switzerland. It stands on 2 very high rocks, and under it runs the river Rufs. It is commonly called Teuffels-bruck, the vulgar not being able to account for it otherwise than as performed by the assistance of that evil spirit.

DEVIL'S MOUTH, a frightful hill near Leon de Nicaragua, in the capital of the province of the latter name, and audience of Guatemala, in New Spain, in South America; which being rent from top to bottom, resembles a broken saw, and has been so denominated by sailors.

DEVIL'S A—— in the Peak, or DEVIL'S CAVE, at Castle-town, in the Peak of Derbyshire, of which we have the following description from the celebrated Mr. Ferguson, who visited it in 1772.

Having heard much of this wonderful curiosity in nature, I was long ago desirous of seeing it, but never had the wished-for opportunity till in the beginning of October, when my business led me through that part of the country where it is; and the following account is the best I can give, from short notes taken down in the different parts of it, as my conductor or guide informed me, who seemed to be very intelligent, and behaved with the greatest degree of civility.

The entrance into this complicated cavern is through an almost regular arch, 12 yards high, formed by nature at the bottom of a rock, whose height is 87 yards. Immediately within this arch is a cavern of the same height, 40 yards wide, and above 100 in length. The roof of this place is flattish, all of solid rock, and looks dreadful over head, because it has nothing but the natural side-walls to support it. A pack-thread manufactory is therein carried on by poor people, by the light that comes through the arch.

Towards the further end from the entrance, the roof comes down with a gradual slope to about 2 feet from the surface of a water 14 yards over, the rock in that place forming a kind of arch, under which I was pushed, by my guide, across the water, in a long oval tub, as I lay on my back in straw, straw, with a candle in my hand, and was, for the greatest part of the way on the river, so near the arched roof, that it touched my hat, if I raised my head but 2 inches from the straw on which I lay in the tub (called the boat), which I believe, was not above a foot in depth.

When landed on the farther side of this water, and helped out of the boat by my guide, I was conducted through a low place into a cavern 70 yards wide, and 40 yards high, in the top of which are several openings upwards, reaching so high, that I could not see to their tops. On one side of this place I saw several young lads, with candles in their hands, clambering up a very rough stony ascent, and they disappeared when about half way up. I asked my guide who they were, and he told me they were the fingers, and that I would soon see them again, for they were going through an opening that led into the next cavern.

At 87 yards from the first water, I came to a second, 9 yards and a half broad, over which my guide carried me on his back. I then went under 3 natural arches, at some distance from one another, and all of them pretty regular; then entered a third cavern, called Roger Rain's house, because there is a continual dropping at one side of it, like a moderate rain. I no sooner entered that cavern, than I was agreeably surpris'd by a melodious singing, which seemed to echo from all sides; and, on looking back, I saw the above-mentioned lads, in a large round opening called the Chancel, 19 yards above the bottom where I stood. They sing for what the visitors please to give them as they return.

At the top of a steep, rugged, stony ascent, on one side of this cavern, I saw a small irregular hole, and asked my guide whether there was another cavern beyond it? He told me there was; but that very few people ventured to go through into it, on account of the frightful appearance at the top of the hole, where the stones seemed to be almost loose, as if ready to fall and close up the passage. I told him, that, if he would venture through, I would follow him: so I did, creeping flat, the place being rather too low to go on all fours. We then got into a long, narrow, irregular, and very high cavern, which has surprising openings, of various shapes at top, too high to see how far they reach.

We returned through the hole into Roger Rain's house again, and from thence went down 50 yards lower, on wet sand, wherein steps are made for convenience; at the bottom of which we entered into a cavern called the Devil's Cellar, in which, my guide told me, there had been many bowls of good rum punch made and drank, the water having been heated by a fire occasionally made there for that purpose. In the roof of this cellar is a large opening, through which the smoke of the fire ascends, and has been seen, by the people above-ground, to go out at the top of the rock. But this opening is so irregular and crooked, that no stone let down into it from the top was ever known to fall quite through into the cavern.

From this place I was conducted a good way onward, under a roof too low to let one walk upright, and then entered a cavern called the Bell, because the top of it is shaped somewhat like the side of a bell. From thence, I was conducted through a very low place into a higher, in the bottom of which runs a third water; and the roof of that place slopes gradually downward, till it comes within 5 inches of the surface of the running water under it. My guide then told me, that I was just 207 yards below the surface of the ground, and 750 yards from the first entrance into the rock, and there was no going any further. Throughout the whole, I found the air very agreeable, and warm enough to bring on a moderate perspiration, although, in less than a fortnight before, all the caverns beyond the first river (where I was ferried under the low arch) had been filled to a considerable height with water, during a flood occasioned by great and long-continued rains.

DEVIZES, in Wiltshire, 24 miles from Salisbury, and 89 from London. It is supposed, from coins, pots, urns, and other antiquities dug up hereabouts, to have been once inhabited by the Romans; and a number of little brass statues of the heathen deities were found under a Roman brick here, in 1714, which were carried about the kingdom for a show. Here was once a noble castle, said to have been one of the strongest in England; and the grant of it was accepted by some of the prime nobility, as an honour. It is a pretty populous town, on high ground, fenced from the east winds by hills that are 2 miles off; and has 2 churches, besides a chapel, and a dissenters' meeting-house. The corporation, by charter of king Charles I. consists of a mayor, recorder, 11 masters, and 36 common council. Its chief manufacture, besides malt, is the woollen, especially druggets. The inhabitants value themselves for being tenants to the king, and for one of the best markets in England; which being on Thursday, is much frequented for corn, wool, horses, and all sorts of cattle; but here is great scarcity of water. The buildings are old, and, for most part, of timber; yet the model of them being good, they look tolerable; and here is a very good charity school. The fairs are February 13, Holy Thursday, June 13, July 5, and October 20, which holds 6 days, and is called the Devizes-Green, because it is kept in a pretty plain, so called, in the suburbs just without the town, where is another handsome church and steeple. A rivulet rises near the castle, which runs into the Avon, near Bremham.

DEULE, a river of Picardy and Artois, in France, was formerly only a little stream; but it has been made a considerable river by means of canals and sluices, for forming a communication between Lens and Lisle, Douay and Deule. The Upper Deule is that which serves for this connection: but the Lower Deule is that which runs below Lisle as far as Lys.

DEUME, or DEINE, a branch of the river Pregel, in the kingdom of Prussia, is connected with the Wippe by means of a new canal, called Fredericks-graben, both the great and small one; so that flax, corn, hemp, wood, pot-ashes, and other Polish goods, may be carried very conveniently to Konigsberg: the communication of which is continued to the Nemmonin, and to the Gilge.

DEVONSHIRE, a county of England. It has the English Channel on the S. the Bristol Channel on the N. It is divided on the W. from Cornwall by the river Tamar, which runs almost from the one channel to the other: and it is bounded on the E. by Somersetshire. It is about 69 miles long, and 66 broad, containing 1,920,000 acres, 12 parliamentary boroughs, 40 market-towns, 394 parishes, 117 vicarages, 1733 villages, and 340,000 inhabitants. Next to Yorkshire, it is the largest and most populous county in England; but its people are so universally employed in trade, that it cannot be equalled by any in the kingdom.

The air in its vallies is mild; and sharp, but healthy, on its hills and heaths. The western parts consist of a moorish soil, or stiff clay; the latter bad for sheep, but extremely well adapted for breeding great herds of fine oxen, fattened for the London markets. The soil of the N. parts is dry, having very good downs for sheep: and these being well dressed with lime, dung, and sand, yield tolerable crops of corn, but not so plentifully as in the middle and eastern parts; nor does it fall short in meadow and pasture. Shell sand renders the most barren part fruitful; and in places remote from the sea-shore, the upper turf being skimmed off, is burn to ashes; and this method of agriculture is called De'enshiring. The southern parts for fertility are justly esteemed the garden of Devonshire.

The South Hams are famous for rough cider. Formerly here were several tin-mines, but little of that metal is now dug in this county. Veins of loadstone are found here; also quarries of stone and slate; and of the latter, great quantities are exported. Its native productions are corn, wool, cattle, &c. and its manufactures, kerseys, serges, druggets, perpetuanas, long-ells, shalloons, narrow cloths, &c. as also bone-lace.

Its principal rivers are the Tamar, Tave, Lid, Ock, Tame, Touridge, Ex, and Dart. Chalybeat waters are at Cleave, Tavistock, Lamerton, Lifton, &c.

Twelve towns send each 2 members to parliament, and the county 2 more.

This county is generally observed to abound with persons afflicted with the gout, owing, it is thought, to the custom of marling the land with lime, and to the great use of sweet cider.

DEUTSCHENDORF, or POPRAD, a middling town in the Circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary, in an extremely delightful situation: for upon one side is the river of the same name; and on the other a large plain. Before the fire in 1718, it was more considerable than at present. The inhabitants live by husbandry.

DEUTSCH-EYLAU, a capital bailiwick in the circle of Mohrung and Marienwerder, in the kingdom of Prussia. In it are 3 Roman Catholic churches; but those belonging to the Lutherans are under the inspection of the Archpriest of Saalfeld. In this bailiwick is an open small town of the same name, with an ancient castle upon a large lake, and in a delightful situation.

DEUX-PONTS, a province of the Palatinate, in Germany, above 40 miles long, and from 8 to 25 in breadth, and gives title to its own dukes, a branch of the Palatine family. Since 1732, it has been in sequestration, by the extinction of the last heir. It is divided into 5 bailiwicks; one of which, namely, Bischweiler, lies in Lower Alsace, besides other lands. It is bounded by Lorraine, and the county of Saarbruck, on the W. Alsace on the S. and every where else by other parts of the Palatinate. This in general is a mountainous, barren country; but here and there are some fertile valleys. Two small valleys join near its capital, and hence its name; and the united stream runs S. to the Sare.

DEUX-PONTS, in the duchy of the same name last-mentioned, by the Germans called Zweybrucken, and in Latin, Bipontium, from its 2 bridges over the rivulets of Blise and Swolb, upon which it stands. This is a small, yet neat town. It suffered very much by the wars, particularly when taken in 1676 by the French, who restored it to the king of Sweden by the treaty of Ryswick. It lies 58 miles N. E. of Nancy. Lat. 49, 30, N. Long. 4, 31, E.

DEWSBURY, a village in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles S. W. of Leeds, with 2 fairs on Wednesday

Wednesday before May 22, and on Wednesday before October 10.

DEYSNE, a town of Flanders, 12 miles S. W. of Ghent. Lat. 51, 10, N. Long. 3, 36, E. See DEINSE.

DHAFAR. See TEHAMAH.

DIA, in the island of Eubœa. On the N. side of this island over against Theffaly, and extending from Cenæum to Artemisium, stood Dia, or Athenæ Diades, founded by Dias an Athenian, who called it after his own name. The inhabitants of Dia peopled the city Canæ in Æolis. Ptolemy calls Dia or Dium only a promontory.

DIANA, now Tagouzainah, in the inland country of the present E. province of Algiers.

DIAMOND, or ROUND ISLAND, one of the Grenadillas in the West Indies, but not inhabited on account of having no fresh water.

DIARBEKER, a province of Asia Minor, or Turkey in Asia, taken in a large sense, comprehends the provinces of Diarbeker Proper, Yerack, and Curdistan, the ancient countries of Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Assyria, together with Babylon. It extends itself along the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, from N. N. W. to S. E. namely, from Mount Taurus, which divides it from Turcomania on the N. to the inmost recess of the Persian gulph on the S. about 600 miles; and from E. to W. namely, from Persia on the E. to Syria and Arabia Deserta on the W. in some places 200, and in others about 300 miles; but in the southern or lower parts not above 150. It extends itself from 30 to 38 degrees N. and consequently enjoys a good temperature of air, and has mostly a rich soil. There are indeed in it some large deserts, which neither bear any sustenance for man or beast, and are without inhabitants. But those provinces which are inhabited are generally very fertile; yet, being inland, they do not drive such a brisk trade, the commodities which they export and barter with their neighbours being chiefly pitch, fruit, silks, &c. The rivers Euphrates and Tigris have their whole course almost through this country. See these rivers under their proper words.

This province is generally represented by modern geographers and travellers, as a country of great natural fertility; but neither well cultivated, nor well peopled. As a frontier towards Persia, it is well fortified and well guarded. But the many cities, once so celebrated, are at present dwindled to ruins. Bagdat, Mosul, and Carahmel, with some few more, continue populous and wealthy, but the rest are no better than mean towns.

The situation of Diarbeker Proper, is in the N. W. part, between the Tigris and Euphrates; the S. part, or Yerack, lies towards Arabia and the Persian gulph; and Curdistan on the N. E. part towards Persia, from which the Tigris divides it.

Since this country has been under the dominion of the Turks, it hath been farther divided into the following beglerbergates; Diabeker, Rika, Mosul, Chirazoul, or Scherezul, Bagdat, and Bassora, if Bassora, according to modern accounts, be not now subject to a prince of its own.

DIARBEKER, the capital of the district of the same name above-mentioned, is by the Turks called Karamed. It stands delightfully on a plain, on the banks of the Tigris, near its source. It is a very strong and populous place, driving a very considerable trade; is surrounded with a double wall, the outer one being flanked with towers. Here are only 3 gates, on one of which are some Greek and Latin inscriptions, mentioning Constantine the Great. The Tigris forms a half-moon before it, on which side is a steep precipice. The river is rapid here, and about a league above the town is a canal cut which supplies it with water. The principal manufactures of Diarbeker, is making goatskins into what we call Turkey or Morocco leather, vast quantities of which are exported into Hungary, Poland, Muscovy, and other parts of Europe and Asia. They also weave and dye here fine linen and cotton cloths.

In this city are said to be no less than 20,000 Christians, two thirds of whom are Armenians, and the rest Nestorians or Jacobites, their patriarch residing here. Here are several convenient inns on both sides of the river. The fair sex enjoy here an extraordinary liberty; and are commonly seen on the public walks. The men are also affable and courteous. This city is governed by a basha. The territory about Diarbeker is very rich and pleasant. The Tigris is here fordable, unless swelled by rain or melted snow, at which times it is crossed a league higher by means of a stone-bridge. It lies 212 miles E. of Aleppo, and 261 N. of Bagdat. Lat. 47, 42, N. Long. 42, 29, E.

DIBLATHAIM, anciently a city of Arabia Petraea, appears from the Old Testament, to have been a place of some note, though its situation cannot from thence be ascertained.

DIBO, another city of the same country.

DICÆPOLIS. See EGESTA.

DICTE, now called Sethia and also Lasshi, a mountain in Crete, is the next in height to Ida, and covered great part of the year with snow, whence by Strabo, &c. it is called the White Mountain; yet cypress trees grew there formerly amidst the snow, and throve as well as in the vallies.

DIE, (Des Vocontiorum) the capital of Diois, in the Lower Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France, on the river Drome. It is the seat of a bailiwick and bishop, who is lord of the place, and of 95 parishes and 24 castles, suffragan to the archbishop of Vienne; his diocese contains 200 parishes and has a yearly income of 1500 livres, out of which he is assessed to pay to the court of Rome 2126 florins. Before the revocation of the edict of Nantz, the Reformed had an university, and here was formerly a citadel. It lies 30 miles S. of Grenoble. Lat. 44, 56, N. Long. 5, 32, E.

DIEGEM, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, 4 miles N. of Brussels, its capital.

DIEL, (St.) provostship of, lying in the valley called Val de Galilee, among the Vange mountains of Lorraine, in France, and on the river Meurte. To it belongs a chapter.

DIEMEN'S LAND, a tract of land in the South Sea, part of New Holland, discovered by Abel Jansen Tasman in 1642. The S. W. extremity of it lies in the 44 S. lat. and the 159 E. long. The southern coast consists of large broken masses of barren and blackish rocks, resembling the extreme points of the African and American continents, round Adventure Bay; where captain Fournieux lay some time in the year 1773; the land rose in sandy hills, of which the innermost were covered with various sorts of trees, rather remote from each other, and without any brush-wood. They perceived no inhabitants during their stay, but thought they observed some smoke at a great distance in the country. Standing along shore to the northward, they found it consisted of hills of a moderate height, but saw at the same time some much higher in the interior country. At different parts of that coast, they met with several islands, particularly those which Tasman named Schouten's, and Vander Lyn's islands.

DIEPPE, a town of Upper Normandy, in France. It is situated in the bottom of a valley, between the cliffs, whence the town took its name, from the Flemish word Diep, which has the same signification with deep in English. On the N. E. side are the suburbs of Pollet, and two stone jetties, between which lies the entrance of the harbour. This entrance is very difficult on account of the great current both inward and outward. It is fortified very irregularly, and has a strong castle on the sea of the same name. To it belong two suburbs, and a harbour on the English channel, commonly in time of war a station for privateers. Here are two parish-churches, eight convents, a college, and an hospital. In 1694 the English battered it quite to the ground by a bombardment; and in Queen Anne's wars it met with a like rough handling from them; but it has since been rebuilt to greater advantage.

The road of Dieppe lies to the W. of the town, just under a small church, called St. Nicholas de

D I

Cotecote, whose steeple is remarkable, and the only one on the cliff. The anchorage is in 7 or 9 fathoms water, on a good bottom, where anchors never drive; whatever wind blows, you are sheltered against winds from S. W. to S. E. but when it blows from the W. N. W. or N. N. E. the sea runs high and impetuous.

Two leagues and a half W. of Dieppe, is Cape Lailly, where the Chamber of Commerce, established at Rouen, has caused to be erected a light-house, which was lighted, for the first time, on the first day of November, 1775.

"The light-house on Cape Lailly is situated 80 fathoms from the edge of the cliff, facing the rock named La Galere, which is the most considerable of those marked on the coast under the denomination of the rocks of Lailly. It is on the top of the cliff, facing the rocks that the tower is built, which may be seen by a boat when at the entrance of the two jetties of the port of Dieppe. The whole height of the light house measuring from the ground, is 56 feet; the lantern 15."

Dieppe lies opposite to Rye in Suffex, and 36 miles N. of Rouen. Lat. 49, 55, N. Long. 1, 9, E.

DIEPHOLT, county of, a subdivision of Westphalia, in Germany, S. of Delmenhorst, between Hoya on the E. and the bishopric of Osnaburg on the W.

DIEPHOLT, the capital of the county of the same name, at the N. extremity of the Dummerlake, on the river Hunte, which issues out of it. Here is a fort; and the town and country now belong to Hanover. It lies 40 miles S. of Bremen. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 8, 12, E.

DISSENHOSEN, a large well-built town of the Thourgaw, and county of Baden, in Switzerland. Here is a fine bridge over the Rhine. It lies four miles E. of Schaffhausen, and in the road to Stein.

DIEST, a small city of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Demer, noted for woollen cloths, hose, and excellent beer. Here is a famous horse-fair kept every Ash-Wednesday. It is a barony, and is still the subject of litigation among the heirs of the late king William. It lies 20 miles N. E. of Louvain. Lat. 51, 16, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

DIETZ, a county of Nassau, in the Wetteraw and Upper Rhine, in Germany, 14 miles long, and 10 broad, belonging to a branch of the Nassau Orange family. It lies between the archbishopric of Treves, the lordships of Idstein and Wisbaden.

DIETZ, the capital of the last mentioned county, on the river Lohn, over which is a bridge. It is walled, and has two castles or towns on two hills within the town. The revenues of its collegiate church, subject to the elector of Treves, have been appro-appropriated since the Reformation to the university of Herborn. It lies 18 miles N. of Mentz. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 7, 38, E.

DIEU, an island of France, on the coast of Poutou.

DIEUSE, a town of France, in Lorraine, remarkable for its salt-pits, where they make a great deal of salt. It is seated on the river Seille, 5 miles E. of Marfai, and 22 N. W. of Nanci. Long. 6, 45, E. Lat. 48, 50, N.

DIEULISH, a river in Dorsetshire, which runs into the Stour, near Stourminster.

DIEULOUARD, lordship of, between the Maes and Moselle, in the government of Lorraine and Bar. It lies on the latter river, not far from Pont a Mousson, and is one of the oldest domains of the church of Verdun; but in latter times, it has come into the possession of the house of Lorraine. The little town of the same name, in Latin Deslonardum, was formerly a strong place.

DIGGE'S ISLAND, an island of Greenland.

DIGHTON, a town of New England, in Bristol county.

DIGNAN, a handsome town of Italy, in Istria, 3 miles from the sea, and subject to the Venetians. Long. 13, 5, E. Lat. 45, 10, N.

DIGNE, a provincial bailiwick of Upper Provence, in France, comprehending the four following vigueries or subordinated districts, namely, Digne, Seyne, Colmars, and the valley of Bareme.

DIGNE, in Latin DINRA, a small but very ancient town in the viguery of its own name, at the foot of the mountains, on the little river Bleone; is the principal place of a district, collection, and provincial court. The bishop of Digne is baron of Lauzieres, and suffragan to the archbishop of Armbun, having 33 parishes in his diocese, an income of 10,000 livres, out of which he pays Rome an assessment of 400 florins. Here are 5 convents. Its warm mineral waters, impregnated with a deal of sulphur and alkaline salt, are used for drinking, as well as bathing. In the neighbourhood grows excellent fruit. It lies 60 miles N. of Toulon. Lat. 44, 12, N. Long. 6, 13, E.

DIGON, in Latin Divio, the capital of the province and government of Burgundy, in France; it is the seat of the governor, parliament, intendency, and all other public offices and jurisdictions: it is pretty large, has well paved, broad, and straight streets, fine houses, churches, and squares, is surrounded and fortified with good walls, capacious ditches, and 12 bastions, besides a castle for its defence. The neighbouring country is fruitful and agreeable, being watered by the river Sufon and Ouche; the former of which is only a brook, partly running into the ditch, and partly through the town; and after this falls into the river Dijon near the city, which river washes a suburb and a bastion. Here are 7 parish-churches, 4 abbeys, 3 large hospitals, several convents, among which the most remarkable is the fine charterhouse, at the extremity of the suburb of Ouche, in the church of which lie the last dukes of Burgundy, with their wives and children, also what was the Jesuits fine house, and the holy chapel, where is publicly preserved a miraculous host. Its academy of sciences was founded by Hector Bernard Poussin, first president of the parliament of Digon, and also a juridical college was established here in 1723. The city-walk before the town is a quarter of a mile in length, and planted with 3 rows of lime-trees, at the extremity of which is a pleasure-grove. The castle of the ancient dukes of Burgundy, now called Le logis du Roi, is a stately and large building, with a noble hall for the meeting of the states. It lies 138 miles S. E. of Paris. Lat. 47, 20, N. Long. 5, 12, E.

DIJONNOIS, a territory of Burgundy, in France, anciently called Pagus Oscarenfis, from the river Ouche, Oscara, it abounds in wine, pastures, and woods; in the last of which are several iron-works set up; and its capital is the above-mentioned Digon.

DILLEMBERG, a town of Nassau in the Wetteraw, and Upper Rhine, in Germany, belonging to the counts of Nassau Dillemburg, on the river Dilla, has a good trade in cattle and woollen-cloth, and 2 annual fairs, the day after Passion-Sunday, and the Monday after St. Margaret's day. Here is a fine strong castle, the seat of the counts, where is kept the jaw-bone of a prodigious whale, caught near Catwick. It lies 38 miles N. of Franckfort. Lat. 50, 29, N. Long. 8, 10, E.

DILLINGEN, a neat small city of Suabia, in Germany, on the Danube, with the title of count, belonging to the bishop of Augsburg, who usually resides in a palace here. In this town is an university and college. Between Dillingen and Lawingen lay the strong camp, where the elector of Bavaria was posted in 1703, when the duke of Marlborough forced the intrenchments at Schellemburg, previous to the famous battle of Hochstadt. It lies a little S. E. of the last-mentioned place, and 18 N. E. of Ulm. Lat. 48, 38, N. Long. 10, 30, E.

DILTON-MARSH, a town in Wiltshire, 3 miles N. of Warminster, with 2 fairs, on Easter-Monday, and September 13.

DIMCHURCH, a place on the coast of Kent, where, in a new hall, are kept the courts and records of Romney-marsh: in the former of these, care is taken that the marsh-laws be strictly observed, and new ones composed for keeping up the walls or fences, and managing the lands.

DIMEN,

D I

DIMEN STORE, i. e. Great Dimen, one of the Faroe-isles belonging to Norway. It is almost round, and a mile in circuit, being a mere rock, and its coasts so craggy and steep, and surrounded in such a manner with precipices and sand-banks, that no place can be better fortified by nature. Upon it the sheep run wild summer and winter. Not far from it is Lille Dimen, or Little Dimen; which Busching says has this peculiar quality in it, that sheep, entirely white, when brought into its pastures, soon become black; which transmutation, continues he, first begins with black spots on the legs that spread upwards, till the whole wool is turned black.

DIMOTUC, a town of Romania, in European Turkey, with a Greek archbishop's see. It is seated on a mountain, surrounded by the river Meriza, 12 miles S. W. of Adrianople, and 25 N. of Traganople. Long. 26, 23, E. Lat. 41, 38, N.

DINAN, a town in the bishopric of St. Malo, and government of Brittany, in France, near the river Rance, (Rinētus) which almost surrounds it: it is a walled town, on the top of a hill, steep every way. The river joining a brook, forms a harbour for pretty large vessels, into which the tide flows 5 feet high. Here is a good castle, 2 convents, and an hospital. At this time the provincial states sometimes meet: and at the suburb of Jargia is a fine quay. Dinan gave title of count to the younger sons of the duke of Brittany. It lies 12 miles S. of St. Malo. Lat. 48, 36, N. Long. 2, 12, W.

DINANT, an ancient town of Liege, in the county of Condres and Austrian Netherlands. It stands between a steep rock and the Maes, which river washes its ramparts. It is an ancient town, and did belong to the bishop of Tongeren, who gave it to its church, whence it fell to the bishops of Liege, the see of Tongeren being removed to that city. It is of oblong figure, and enjoys a good trade, particularly in manufactures of brass and iron. It had a strong citadel on a steep rock; but the French having taken it in 1554, 1675, 1690, from time to time, more and more, demolished it. They restored it again in 1697 by the treaty of Ryfwick; and the fortifications being afterwards repaired, were again demolished in 1703. The chief church is collegiate, the 9 parish churches being properly but chapels of ease belonging to it. Here are several convents. It lies 16 miles S. of Namur. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 4, 48, E.

DINASMONDY, a town of Merionethshire, in North Wales, with a market on Fridays, and 4 fairs, on June 2, September 10, October 1, and November 10. It is 18 miles S. of Bala, 8 E. by S. of Dolegelly, and 176 N. W. of London. Long. 4, 35, W. Lat. 53, 37, N.

D I

DINDER-HILL, a mountain of Herefordshire, on which is a Roman camp; it stands near the river Wye.

DINGDING, an island about 30 leagues to the N. of Malacca, in the East Indies, uninhabited; but the fresh water, which runs down from the rocks, claims preference to any in the Indies. It has likewise several good bays where ships may safely ride. Wild boars swim over hither from the continent to feed on a certain root which grows here.

DINGELFING, a town of Bavaria, in Germany, on the river Isar. It lies 18 miles E. of Landshut. Lat. 48, 39, N. Long. 12, 38, E.

DINGHISLY, a large and well-peopled Turkish town of Lydia and Turkey, in Asia. It drives a considerable trade; about 18 miles S. of Laodicea, and 10 E. of the river Meander.

DINGLE, the best town in the county of Kerry, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It lies on a large bay of the same name, which runs up 28 miles inland, 15 broad at its entrance, with several harbours or roads. It has the privilege of a market, and sends 2 members to the Irish Parliament. It lies 79 miles W. of Limerick.

DINGO, or DRNGY, an inland country of Lower Ethiopia, borders on the kingdoms of Loango and Vanquy, and is large, full of towns and villages, tributary to the king of Loango, but has its peculiar lords, who rule by succession.

DINGWALL, or DINGWELL, of Ross-shire, in the N. of Scotland, consisting but of one street, at the head of the Cromarty-frith, which is a N. W. branch of Murray-frith. Its charter from king Alexander III. grants it the same privileges as those given to the town of Inverness, to which it refers. Near it is the water of Fhoheran: and hence it is called Inner-Fhoheran. A very good perennial spring, from the neighbouring hill runs through the town, and supplies it with water.

The soil round this place or burgage-land, is exuberantly fertile. Its church a few years ago, was burnt down, by a school-boy's shooting at pigeons, when the thatch took fire; but it is now handsomely repaired. This is the county-town for the western division of Ross-shire, as Tayne, is for the eastern, and Fortrose the southern. Here are the ruins of a very spacious castle, said to have been the residence of that Highland king and usurper (Donaldus Insulanus,) Donald of the Isles, and earl of Ross. Near the church are the remains of a chapel, where lies the great Tutor of Kintail, a descendant of the Seaforth family, and ancestor of the earl of Cromarty. In the churchyard is a very ancient monumental stone of one à Kempis, with a Latin inscription, by some vestiges of which, hardly legible, it appears that he was some person of of eminence, and near it is a lofty pyramid, at the bottom of which George, the first and great earl of Cromarty, lies interred, and he had caused it to be erected in his life-time. In this place is a genteel, modern built town-house, with a spire and prison, to which the late Sir Robert Munro of Foulis, their member for several years, very largely contributed. The country round it is very plentiful, but here seems to be little or no trade. This is one of the districts of royal burghs, which with Tayne, Dornock, Weick, and Kirkwall, alternately sends one member to the British parliament. It lies about 8 Scotch miles N. W. of Inverness, the same W. of Cromarty, and 130 N. of Edinburgh.

DINKELSPIL, or DUNCKELSPIEL, a small imperial city of Suabia, on the confines of Franconia, in Germany. It is watered on the W. and S. by two arms of the river Wernits, which supplies it with fish, as does the neighbourhood with plenty of corn. In Latin it is called Tricollis, and Zeapolis. Its parish-church of St. George is a fine free-stone structure. The Swedes took this town before the battle of Nordlingen, and it lies 36 miles N. of Ulm. Lat. 49, 20, N. Long. 10, 29, E.

DINKIRA, or DUNKIRA, on the Gold Coast, or coast of South Guinea, Africa, is a country lying above 10 days' journey by land from Axim, and 5 from Mina N. having Cabesterra E. Adom, W. and Accany N. The roads to it from Axim are very bad and winding. It was a country of small compass, and not populous; but the valour of the natives enlarged its borders, and raised its power so high, that they were feared and respected by all the nations round about but of Affiante and Akim. The Dinkirans were vastly rich in gold, as well brought from other parts as yielded by their own mines. Which gold is naturally very fine, but too often mixed with Fetiché gold, which is a sort of artificial gold composed of several ingredients. The Affiantines have almost extirpated this nation and destroyed their country.

DIOIS, (Le,) a territory of the Lower Delphinat, and government of Dauphiny, in France, was formerly a county, and sold to the crown, since which the king of France is stiled Count of Dios, in all his briefs to Dauphiny.

DIOMEDES, an island so called near the promontory of the N. E. point of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia.

DIOS CURIAS, an ancient city of Colchis on the Euxine sea, and was a place of great trade.

DIRG, (Lough,) i. e. the Red Lake, in the county of Donegal, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, noted for an island and a dark cell or cave in it, where popish friars used to make their votaries believe St. Patrick had his purgatory.

DIOSPOLIS, anciently a city in Lesser Thebais, Egypt. There was another town of this name in Palestine, vulgarly Rhama, which Galtus destroyed at the same time and for the same cause as Dioscaesarea. A third Diospolis situated was in Bithynia.

DIRGHAW, a town of Germany in Prussia, and in the palatinate of Culm, seated on the river Vistula, 10 miles from Marienburg, and 17 from Dantzick. Long. 19, 25, E. Long. 54, 3, N.

DIRSCHAU. See DERSAU.

DIS, a large and populous village of Norfolk, on the Waveney, where is held an annual fair, on October 28. It lies 18 miles from Norwich, and 90 from London.

DISAPPOINTMENT-ISLANDS, discovered by Commodore Byron, in 1765, situated in Lat. 14, 5, S. and 144, 58, W. Long. whose inhabitants being hostile, and the want of a landing-place prevented its being explored.

DISCO, a large island in Davis's straits, on the W. coast of Groenland.

DISENTIS, a place in the Grisons of Switzerland, and situated on the Rhine, where is a very old rich abbey.

DISNAJO, a beautiful castle on the river Maros, in Transylvania, a kingdom of Hungary.

DISSE, Norfolk, 13 miles from Norwich, and 92 measured miles from London, stands in the most southern confines of the county. The market, which is well stored with yarn and linen cloth, besides other goods, is on Friday, and the fair on November 9. It is a neat flourishing town, with one large church, a Presbyterian and a Quaker's meeting. It has about 600 good houses, the streets are well paved, pretty wide, and always clean. At the W. end of the town is a large meer, or lake, but it is so muddy, that the inhabitants can make no other use of it but in catching of eels. In the town is carried on manufactories of hempen cloth, hose, and the making of stays. Here is a charity-school.

DITMANING, or TITMONING, a town of Bavaria, on the Iser. It has been reduced by several casualties, yet is still fortified, but not strong; it lies 6 miles from Saltzburg, between Birkhausen and Lauffen.

DITMARSH, according to some Teutismarsh, from the ancient Teutons, a district of Holstein, in Germany. It has the German ocean on the W. and Holstein Proper on the S. and E. the Elbe being its southern, and the Eyder its northern boundary. This country being subdued in 1759, by Federick III. king of Denmark, assisted by the duke of Holstein, was shared between them both; the N. part to the duke, and the S. part to the king. It is fruitful in all sorts of grain, with excellent pastures that feed cattle of every kind, being well watered and populous. The peasants here live well, are laborious, and accounted strong and warlike.

DIVE, one of the rivers of Normandy, which rising in the parish of Cour-Menil, receives the Vie, after which it becomes navigable, and loses itself in the sea.

DIVER, a river in Wilts, which runs into the Nadder at Bishopstrow.

DIVIN, a castle in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, upon a very steep rock. In 1576 it was taken by the Turks, who kept it till 1593. In the year 1674, it was taken from the restless Balassa, and demolished; so that at present it is no more than a heap of rubbish. From it a place in the neighbourhood takes its name, in whose jurisdiction it stands. The inhabitants employ themselves in agriculture and hunting.

DIU, DIO, or DEW, an island 3 miles long and 2 broad, the southmost land on Guzaratte, or Cambaya, in the Hither India, having a small city of the same name, (Diu,) at the entrance of the gulph of Cambaya, about 200 miles W. of Surat, E. long. 70, 12. Lat. 21, 37. It is separated from the main by a narrow channel, over which is a stone bridge. Alexander is supposed to have embarked here for Cambaya; and it was by Arrian, Pliny, and Strabo, called Nambator, Delta, Patala, Patalena, and Hydaspia. Herbert places it 60 leagues S. of Ormus, 200 N. W. from Cape Comerin; and Bouffingault makes it 70 leagues from the Indies, and 30 from the town of Cambaya. It was fortified by Albuquerque, the famous Portuguese general, in 1515, and has been besieged in vain by the Indians, Arabs, and Turks, who were obliged to retire with great loss. It has a good safe harbour, and had formerly a good trade, but since the English, Dutch, and French, settled in Surat, and Cambaya, it is much decayed. Hamilton says, the city is pretty large, fortified by a high stone-wall, with bastions, well furnished with cannon to flank it, and a deep moat hewn out of a hard rock.

DIUL, a town of Tatta or Sinda, a kingdom in the Hither India, in Asia. It has a very commodious harbour, and here ships usually touch that sail from India to Ormus. It stands at the mouth of the Indian gulph. It was ceded to Kouli Khan by the Mogul, when his prisoner at Delhi. It lies 58 miles W. of the city of Tatta. Lat. 26, 11, N. Long. 68, 58, E.

DIXCOVE, an English fort in Guinea Proper in Africa. It is a regular fortification, with 4 good batteries. It stands 7 or 8 leagues to the N. E. of Cape Three Points, and is subordinate to Cape Coast-Castle. Here is a very safe cove or landing-place.

DIXMUYDE, a town of Flanders, in the Austrian Low-countries, on the Ypres; though strong, it has been often taken. The pastures in this neighbourhood yield excellent butter, and in the town are several religious houses, and 2 hospitals. It lies 15 miles N. of Ypres. Lat. 51, 15, N. Long. 2, 48, E.

DIZIER, (Str.) in Latin, Fanum Sancti Desiderii, a town of Pertois and Upper Champagne, in France, on the river Marne, the seat of a royal bailiwick, forest-court, salt-house and marshal's. It is one of the crown-domains, and has a particular governor. Here are 2 convents and an hospital. In the neighbourhood are iron-works, and in 1544 the emperor Charles V. besieged it. Dizier lies 50 miles N. E. of Troyes. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 5, 12, E.

Of the same name is a small place in Lower Languedoc.

DNIEPER, or NIEPER, in Latin, Danapris, or Borysthenes, a considerable river in European Russia. It rises out of a morass in the forest of Wolchonskoi, about 20 miles above Smolensko, in the Budine mountains of Russia, with a variety of windings in its course through Lithuania, the county of the Zaporog Cossacs, and a strip of land possessed by the Nagai Tartars before the Crim; at length it falls between Oczakow and Kinburn, into the Black Sea, having first formed a marshy lake, which is 60 wersts in length, and in many places from 2 or 4, to 10 wersts in breadth. The banks of this river are high on both sides almost throughout, and the neighbouring soil excellent; but in summer its water is none of the wholesomest. In it are 13 water-falls, within the space of 60 wersts; yet even in spring, when the waters are high, or at a middling pitch, light boats may be brought over these.

As far as this lake the river is full of islands; so that taking all together, it has not 7 miles of unencumbered water. It abounds in sturgeon, carps, and jacks, with a great variety of other peculiar fish. Over it is no bridge, but a floating one at Kiow, which is 1638 paces in length; and is taken down before the frost comes on, about the close of September, and put up again in spring. Ferry-boats therefore are used, for the conveniency of trading with the Poles. Upon this river are several mills.

DNIESTER, or NIESTER, in Latin, Danapris, anciently Tyrais or Tyres, a river of Poland. It issues issues from a lake in the Carpathian mountains, and runs between Poland and Moldavia, forming the boundary of the latter to the N. and S. and empties itself into the Euxine sea.

DOARNENES, or DOUARNENES, a town in the most western part of the bishopric of Quimper, in Lower Brittany, in France. Here is a good port at the upper end of a bay, to which it gives its name, and contiguous to that of Brest; and here they take great numbers of pilchards. It lies 4 leagues from Quimper-Corentin to the S. W. and 9 from Brest to the S.

DOBELIN, or DOBLEHN, a district of Semigallia and duchy of Courland. Here is an old castle with a princely bailiwick. It lies 36 miles W. of Mittaw. Lat. 57, 20, N. Long. 23, 25, E.

DOBEZIN, or DOBRZYN, a town in the palatinate of Uladislaw and Cujavia, in Great Poland. It stands upon a rock on the Vistula, with a provincial court belonging to it. It lies 68 miles N. W. of Warsaw. Lat. 53, 10, N. Long. 29, 12, E.

DOLRA, a castle in the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands on a very high mountain, at the foot of which is a town of the same name. Also a scone or citadel in Transylvania.

DOBRING, DOBRONA, or DOBRONIWA, a well-built town in the Hither Circle, of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands near the castle of the same name, though it belongs to the jurisdiction of that of Altfohl.

DOBRUDSCHE, a territory of Bulgaria, in European Turkey, extending itself from the town of Dorestero as far as the efflux of the Danube; it is a strip of land quite level, which is not intersected either by rivers nor interrupted by forests; so that a wood at the extremity of it, not far from Dorestero, is called by the Turks Dali Orman, i. e. the wood of fools. The inhabitants, according to their pedigree, are Tartars, whose ancestors came into this country out of Asia. They are now called Tschitacs, and are famous for their extraordinary hospitality to strangers, of any nation or religion soever. For as soon as any of these come into their villages, the men and their wives immediately appear before their door, and accost them in the most friendly terms, intreating them to step into their habitations, and partake of what God has sent them; and at the same time maintaining their horses, if they do not exceed 3 in number, for 3 days together, at free-cost, with such politeness and generosity as are hardly to be met with in any other part of the world. They set honey and eggs before their guests, both which this country produces very exuberantly, and bread, though baked under the ashes, yet a fine sort. A little place inviolably sequestered, for the accommodation of strangers, these hospitable people provide, with resting couches, which are set in the middle round the hearth, and their guests may use them as they think best for their own convenience.

An instance of benevolence mentioned by Buching, which we the more readily take notice of, as it may be the only one to be met with in this vast empire, and as a brutal ferocity and universal contempt of the rest of mankind, unless mussulmen, prevails wherever the Turks have introduced themselves, these insinuating their reproach of this worthy people, couched under the appellation which they have given the above-mentioned wood.

DOBSCHAW, a mountain-town of Gomor county, and Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary, where are many German inhabitants. It is a place famous for iron, asbestos, zinnobar, and paper.

DOCKUM, a strong town of Friesland, on the river Aa, which a little below forms a harbour for small vessels, and in a fruitful country. Here is a broad stone-bridge, with high arches, besides 2 other bridges. One of these is drawn up with chains for vessels to pass through; the river is commanded by good block-houses, and a boom left open by day, but let down at night. Of a handsome cemetery here, now only remains a stately tower. It lies 15 miles N. E. of Leewarden. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 6, 15, E.

DODBROOK, a town of Devonshire, with a harbour for boats, and a market on Wednesday. Here the tythe is paid of a liquor called white ale. From this place the land runs out into a broad front called the Start Point, gathering in again to the mouth of the river Dart.

DODONA is placed by some writers in Thesprotia, and by others in Molossis, a province in Epirus; but Strabo reconciles these 2 opposite opinions, by telling us, that anciently it belonged to Thesprotia, and afterwards to Molossis; for it stood on the confines of both provinces. This city was once famous for the temple and oracle of Jupiter Dodonæus, as also a sacred grove, much spoke of by all the ancient writers.

DOE, or DOUE, in Latin Theotunadum, a small city of Anjou, in France, with a parochial and collegiate church, also a convent and an hospital. Here is a fountain in the form of a horse-shoe, 72 feet in circuit, and 2½ in depth; the water runs into a basin 150 feet long, at the end of which is a stone bridge, where it goes off, turning several mills, and afterwards watering several bleaching meadows.

DOEL, a town of Dutch Brabant, in the Netherlands, and on the W. side of the Scheld. It lies lies opposite to Lillo, and 9 miles N. W. of Antwerp. Lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 4, 5, E.

DOESBURG, a town of Guelderland, near the confluence of the Yffel and the canal from the Rhine. The French took it in 1672, and in 1674 abandoned it after demolishing the works. It lies 12 miles S. of Zutphen. Lat. 51, 56, N. Long. 5, 46, E.

DOFRE-FIELD, reckoned the highest mountain in all Norway, dividing that kingdom from Sweden. Upon it are 3 mountain-lodges or resting-places, kept up at the public charge, for the conveniency of travellers this way, and provided with fire, candle, and other accommodations. In 1685 king Christian V. of Denmark rode over Dofre-field, though all who were in his train dismounted and went on foot. On the highest part major-general Wibe saluted his majesty with a discharge of 9 pieces of cannon; and, in memory of this, a pyramid was erected by the king's order.

DOGADO DI VENEZIA, or the duchy of Venice Proper. It is one of the territories of the Venetian dominions, and consists partly of islands, and partly of a small neck of land on the continent opposite to that city. It is bounded by the Paduano on the W. and the gulph of Venice on the E.

DOGS-ISLAND, one of the smaller Virgin Isles, situated on the W. of Virgin Gorda, and E. of Tortula. Long. 62, 55. Lat. 18, 20.

DOGS, (Isle of,) in Dutch Honden-eylant, lying in the Terra Australis, so called by Schouten's people, who went ashore on it, from their observing 3 dogs there, which did not bark. It is situated about lat. 15, S. 925 leagues W. from the coast of Peru, in or about long. 148 W. from London. It is but a small and very low island, where they found some herbs which tasted almost like garden-creffes. They supposed that it was overflowed at high tides, as they found salt water about the middle, and in other places. On one side of this island they observed a row of very green trees, planted, as it were, along a dyke.

DOG-PLAINS, or La Prairies les Chiens, a large Indian town, on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Ouifconson river. It contains about 300 houses, well built after the Indian manner, and is the great mart where all the adjacent tribes, and even those who inhabit the remote branches of the Mississippi annually assemble in May with their furs, to dispose of to the traders.

DOIER, a river in Herefordshire, which falls into the Mannow below Elston bridge.

DOL, a bishopric of Upper Brittany, in France, is the smallest in the whole kingdom, and only about 5 leagues in circuit.

Of the same name is the only town in it, which is small, thinly inhabited, and situated in a marshy and unhealthy neighbourhood, near the English channel. It is the seat of a bishop, collection, and admiralty. The bishop is lord of the city, and styles himself count of it; he is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Tours, has a diocese of 80 parishes, with a revenue of 20,000 livres, out of which he pays an acknowledgment of 4000 florins to the court of Rome. It lies 14 miles S. E. of St. Malo. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 1, 50, W.

DOLCIGNO, or DULCIGNO, in Latin Ulcinium, or Olchinium, a town of Albania, one of the provinces of Turkey in Europe. It has a good harbour on the Adriatic sea, and a strong castle. The inhabitants of this place employ themselves very much in piracy, at which they are infamous, and subject to the Turks; and in the year 1571, this place fell into their hands. It lies 46 miles S. E. of Ragusa. Lat. 42, 12, N. Long. 19, 15, E.

DOLE, or MILIEU, one of the 4 large bailiwicks of Franche Comte, a government of France. It comprehends 3 subordinate districts; namely, Dole Proper, Quingey, and Ornans.

In Dole, a district, which, on account of its beauty and fertility, is styled Val d'Amours, is a town of the same name, which formerly had imperial privileges, like Besançon; was the capital of the county, the seat of a parliament, chamber of accounts, an university, and a fortified place also. But Lewis XIV. having taken it in 1668, dismantled it, and again, in 1674, from the Spaniards, who had re-fortified it, he a second time destroyed its works. After which the parliament and university were removed to Besançon, the chamber of accounts only remaining here. It has also a chapter, a college, 11 convents, and an hospital. It lies 18 miles S. W. of Besançon. Lat. 47, 15, N. Long. 5, 15, E.

DOLGELHEW, DOLGELLY, or DOLGELBE, so called, as being situated in a woody vale by the Avon; a town of Merionethshire, in North Wales, at the foot of Mount Idris, said to be above 3 miles high, and one of the highest in Britain. It has a good market on Tuesday, and is of some importance for the sale of Welch cottons. Several Roman coins have been dug up in the neighbourhood; among which were some silver ones of Trajan and Hadrian. Its annual fairs are, May 11, July 4, September 20, October 9, November 22, and December 16. It lies 40 miles N. W. of Montgomery. Lat. 53, 14, N. Long. 4, 16, W.

DOLICA,

DOLICA, or DOLICHE, the latter being its old name; an ancient episcopal see, in Syria Proper, a subdivision of Asia Minor, and under that of Antioch. It is now but a poor place.

DOLLART-BAY, a large gulph, dividing East Friesland in the N. W. part of Westphalia, in Germany, from Groningen. Upon this bay stands Embden, at the mouth of the Ems.

DOLONCI, one of different nations, anciently of Thrace.

DOLOPES. On the south borders of Thrace were seated the Dolopes and Myrmidons, whom Achilles led to the Trojan war.

DOLOROUS-HILL, or GOLGATHA, the rock on which Nottingham stands, so called from a great slaughter, it is said, committed there. See NOTTINGHAM.

DOLTABAD, DULTABAD, or DAULATABAD, in the province of Balaguate, in Hither India, was its capital before conquered by the Mogul, situated 240 miles S. E. of Surat, E. long. 75, 90, lat. 20, 14. It is reckoned one of the strongest of the Mogul's places, by reason of a hill in the middle, on which is the palace, with a good citadel and 3 other forts, with a free-stone wall surrounding the town and palace, with battlements and towers mounted with cannon.

DOLTON, a village in Devonshire, 6 miles S. by E. of Torrington; with 2 fairs, on Wednesday before March 25, and November 20.

DOMBES, a sovereign principality, not belonging to the government of Burgundy, in France, though within the circuit thereof.

This country is surrounded on the E. by Bresse, on the N. by Maçonnois, on the W. by Beaujolais, and on the S. by Lyonnois. It is 9 leagues in length, and much about the same in breadth, being pleasant and fruitful, and lying along the W. side of the Saone. It formerly made a part of the kingdom of Burgundy; but was disjoined from it at the close of the tenth, or beginning of the eleventh century; and was an independent lordship successively in several illustrious houses, till Anne Marie Louise of Orleans bequeathed it, in the year 1681, to the ducal house of Maine. Lewis XIV. declared this country a free and independent principality, whose sovereign coins money, has power of life and death, may confer nobility, and lay what taxes he pleases on his subjects: he styles himself, By the grace of God, &c. and holds a parliament of his own at Trivoux. His stated revenues amount to about 150,000 livres. The country is in the prince of Dombes's name, under the direction of a general governor; it contains 230 places, and is subdivided into 11 castles; namely, Trivoux, Toissey, Montmerle, Beauregard, Villeneuve, Ligneu, Amberieu, St. Trivier, Lent, Chatelar, and Baneins.

DOMBOVAR, a demolished castle of the Further Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stood on a small island, in the river Sarwitz; and was formerly famous in the Turkish wars.

DOMEA, sometimes called Chaule, a considerable river of Tonquin, one of the Chinese provinces, in Asia. Upon it stands the capital Kec-cio, with most of the other towns. Its source is in the province of Yunan, in China; and, after a southerly course through Tonquin, it falls at last into Cochinchina bay.

DOMBURG, formerly a rich and populous town, with extensive privileges, in the island of Walcheren and Zealand, one of the Seven United Provinces. In its neighbourhood several Roman antiquities, with the trunks of trees, have been dug up.

DOME, or DOMME, in Latin Mons Domæ, as situated on a hill; by which means it is rendered strong, and is also defended by a castle, a town of Lower Perigord, in Guyenne Proper, in the government of the former name, and Gascony, in France. It stands on the Dordogne, confining on Quercy, and about a league from Sarlat, to the S.

DOMFRONT, a town in the little territory of Passais, and Lower Normandy, in France. It stands on a rocky hill, on the Mayenne, and is the seat of a viscounty, election, bailiwick, &c. Here are some churches and convents. It lies 5 or 6 leagues above the city of Maine.

DOMINGO, (St.) or HISPANIOLA, one of the Large Antilles islands, in the West Indies. It partly belongs to the Spaniards, and partly to the French. The natives styled it Aititi, and the Spaniards, when Christopher Columbus first discovered it, in 1492, called it Hispaniola, or the Spanish Island. The city, which he founded in 1494, being dedicated to St. Dominic, the name was first extended to that quarter of the island, and in process of time to the whole; so that it is now generally in our charts, &c. St. Domingo. It is situated in the middle between Cuba and Jamaica on the N. W. and S. W. and Porto-Rico on the E. and separated from the last only by a narrow channel. It extends from lat. 17, 37, to lat. 20, and from long. 67, 35, to long. 74, 15, being near 400 miles from W. to E. and almost 120, where broadest, from N. to S. Some reckon it 300 leagues in circuit, exclusive of its bays, creeks, &c. which, it is thought, would make up 200 more. It is distant from Cuba but 13 leagues, which strait is called the Windward Passage. The climate here is extremely hot, but cooled by winds that blow at certain seasons. It also rains excessively.

fively at some times, yet not at all places alike. Though the climate agrees but badly with newcomers, yet they live here in good health, and to a great age, many of the inhabitants exceeding 80, and some reaching to 120 years.

This island, which, next to Cuba, is the largest of all the Antilles, is allowed to be the most fruitful, and by much the pleafantest, in the West Indies, having vast forests of cabbage-trees, palms, elms, oaks, pines, the jenipah, caramite, acajou, and other trees still larger, and the fruit more pleasing to the eye, and better tasted than in the other islands; particularly ananas, bananas, grapes, oranges, lemons, citrons, toronias, limes, dates, and apricots. Here are all the birds common in the West Indies; as also the musketoes, and fire-flies. In the meadows, or savannahs, are innumerable herds of black cattle, which belong to the country. There are a sufficient quantity of horses in the French part of the island to supply all their neighbouring colonies, besides wild horses and wild hogs of the breed first brought over by the Spaniards. The hunters shoot the oxen for their hides, as they do in Cuba; and, with regard to the pork, they strip the flesh from the bones, and jerk it as they do in Jamaica. Scarce a country in the world is better watered, either by brooks or navigable rivers, which are all full of fish, as the coast is of crocodiles and tortoises. Its principal river is called Ocoa. In the sands of the rivers they find gold dust; and the island has many mines of gold, silver, and copper, which, though formerly worked with great profit, yet the Spaniards have found themselves too weak to carry them on to advantage, and take all the care they can to conceal them from others. The principal commodities of this island are hides, sugar, indigo, cotton, cocoa, coffee, ginger, tobacco, salt, wax, ambergris, various sorts of drugs, and dyers wood. What corn they have ripens at such different times, that it cannot be reaped with any profit. The numbers of French on this side is said to equal, if not exceed, that of the Spaniards; though both together are very far short of what the island is capable of maintaining. In 1726, the inhabitants were computed at 30,000 whites, and 100,000 negroes and mulattoes, namely Creols and Mestizoes; whose daily allowance is potatoes, though they have leave to keep hogs.

The Spaniards, by degrees, conquered the natives, and in battle, and cold blood, destroying 3,000,000 men, women, and children. As this island was among the first discovered by the Spaniards, so it was the centre of their commerce in these parts; and as they had been for many years sole possessors of it, it was for some part of the time a very flourishing colony. But after the conquest of Peru, and the considerable additions made to the territories on the continent of N. America, they neglected this island, which encouraged the French, about the middle of the last century, to fix themselves on its W. part, where they have improved the settlements.

In short, the frequent descents both of the English and French on the W. part of the island, by degrees obliged the Spaniards to abandon all that part of it to the W. of Monte Christo, on the N. and Cape Mongon on the S. The French, indeed, had no legal settlement here till 1697, when the Spaniards yielded the W. half of the island to them by the treaty of Ryswick, the boundaries between them and the French were settled by a line drawn across the country from N. to S.

For many years its principal trade consisted in tobacco, in which from 60 to 100 ships had been employed; but that sunk to nothing upon the establishing an exclusive farm of this commodity in France: and afterwards sugar became the staple-commodity in the island; and generally it yields 3 or 4 shillings a hundred more than that produced in any of the other islands. In 1726 it was computed here were 200 sugar-works; and one year with another the island made 400 hogheads, of 500 weight each, and that it yielded annually to the French 200,000 l. and the Indigo is reckoned to produce near half as much.

The colony of the French here is allowed to be the most considerable and important they have in these parts; and would become much more so, could they get a cession of the other part from the Spaniards, which they have extremely at heart. They are already possessed of so many noble harbours and forts as gives them an opportunity of disturbing and ruining the commerce of any nation which they happen to be at war with. And indeed so many harbours are all round the island, that sailors can scarce miss of one in which they may have fresh water and provisions.

The part of the island belonging to the French is under a general of their own country. It begins at a large plain, called Bahaia, on the north side of the island, and about 30 miles east of Cape François: and extending all along the coast from thence to the west, reaches on the south side as far as Cape Mongon; measuring all the bays, creeks, &c. cannot be less than 300 leagues in circuit: but, exclusive of those windings, it is 215 from Cape François on the north, to that of Mongon on the south. On the west side from Cape Lobos to that of Tiberon, where is a round black rock, which is the most western point of the whole island, are four harbours, larger and better than any in England. From Cape Tiberon to that of Donna Maria on the same side, but 25 miles to the the north, are two more excellent harbours; and from this cape to that of St. Nicholas on the N. E. which is itself a large, deep, safe harbour, 12 more, each of which lies near the confluence of 2 or 3 rivers. The French governor-general has under him the governors of Cape François, St. Louis, or P^{le} de Vache, and those of Port Paix and Petit Guaves. The most noted places in the French part of St. Domingo, as they lie from the S. W. to the N. E. are, St. Louis, Vache, Donna Maria bay, Fond de Negros, Petit Guaves, Leogane, several desert islands in the bay called Cul de Sac de Leogane, the largest of which is called Gonave, la Petite Riviere, l'Esterre, Port Paix, Cape St. Nicholas, Tortugas or Tortulas island, and Cape François.

The east part of this island, in the possession of the Spaniards, is the largest. The commodities of the whole colonies of France in St. Domingo amounted in 1764 to 80,000,000 weight of rough sugar, 35,000,000 of refined sugar, and 1,880,000 pounds of indigo; at the same time they gathered 7,000,000 weight of coffee, and 1,500,000 pounds of cotton. Above half these were the product of the north coast alone; the rest came from the west and south. There was, besides, this difference, that the indigo and cotton were chiefly from the south and west, and the sugar and coffee from the north.

In 1764 this island had 8786 whites able to bear arms; 4306 inhabitants on the north, 3470 on the west, and 1010 on the south coasts; from hence, according to the general method of calculating, the whole of the whites was above 35,000. To these were to be added 5817 mulattoes, or free negroes, who were enrolled. The negroes were 206,000, and dispersed in the following manner: 12,000 in the 9 great towns; 4000 in country towns, 1000 in raising vegetables; and 180,000 in the culture which produced the commodities for exportation. After this enumeration, in 1767, 51,567 negroes were imported in 171 French ships. The deficiency of dead ones has been more than sufficiently supplied by those introduced in a clandestine trade; and it is confidently asserted, there are not less than 250,000 now in the French division only; and the culture of the land has increased proportionably. The culture of indigo is diminished, but there are 40 new sugar-plantations; so that they reckon 260 in the north division, 197 in the west, and 84 in the south. There are also some plantations of cocoa raised in the woods. In 1767 there was exported by the French from this island 124,000,000 weight of sugar, 1,769,562 pounds of indigo, 150,000 pounds of cocoa, 12,197,977 pounds of coffee, 2,965,920 pounds of cotton, 8470 packets of raw hides, 10,350 sides of tanned hides, 4180 hogsheds of rum, and 21,104 hogsheds of molasses, all of which was registered at the custom-house, and exported in 347 ships. To which may be added a sixth more, that was smuggled out; and yet those well versed in the island say it will produce a third as much more; of such prodigious value is this island!

DOMINGO, (St.) the capital of the above island, first built by Columbus on the S. side of it, and situated at the mouth of the river Ozama, or Isabella, in a fine plain, which shews it to a great advantage from the sea. Bartholomew Columbus, brother to the admiral, is said to have founded it in the year 1594, and gave it the name of Domingo, or Dominic, in honour of St. Dominic. It was taken by Sir Francis Drake, in 1586, who held it a month, and then burnt a part of it; but spared the rest for a ransom of 60,000 pieces of eight. It soon recovered itself; but the trade, which was considerable in sugar, hides, tallow, horses, hogs, and cassia, has decayed since the Spaniards have been tempted by later discoveries in Mexico, &c. Nevertheless, it still makes a good figure; and its inhabitants, including the negroes, &c. are thought to exceed 25,000; and some reckon them many more. They are Spaniards, Mestizoes, Mulattoes, and Albatraces, and of these a sixth part is supposed to be Spaniards. St. Domingo is a large, well-built city, a good port, and it has several structures more magnificent than is usual in the West Indies, especially those of the king of Spain's collectors. Here is a Latin school, and hospital with an endowment of 20,000 ducats per annum, besides an university. Here is a fine cathedral, 7 large monasteries, and 2 nunneries, besides a mint, and a college, with a revenue of 4000 ducats. It is the see of an archbishop, whose suffragans are the bishops of La Concepcion in this island, St. John's in Porto Rico, St. Jago in Cuba, Venezuela in New Castile, and of the city of Honduras. Here also is the residence of the governor-general of the Spanish Indies, and of the judges of the royal courts; which makes it the supreme seat of justice, as it is the most eminent royal audience of the Spaniards in America; so that the lawyers and the clergy keep this city from utter decay, since the declension of its trade. The greatest part of the commerce carried on by the Spaniards of this island is, however, from this port, which has 15 fathoms water at the bar; it is safe and large, and defended by several batteries, with a castle at the end of the pier, which has 2 half-moons within it, and reaches by 2 bulwarks to the river. On the utmost shore, near the south bulwark, stands a round tower. It has a very commodious harbour, deep enough for ships to go in and out with their whole lading, having not less than than 3 fathoms every where. A ship may lie close to the shore to take in her loading, only laying a plank from the ship's side to the shore.

The president from Old Spain lives in a house in this city, that is said to have been built and occupied by Columbus himself. To this officer, on account of prior settlement, appeals are brought from all the Spanish West India islands, as formerly they were from every province of Spanish America; and his sentence is definitive, unless it is called by a particular commission into old Spain. As he purchases his place, he consequently executes it with oppression.

St. Domingo is built of stone, after the Spanish model, having a large square market-place in the middle, about which stands the cathedral, and other public buildings. And from this square the principal streets run in a direct line, being crossed by others at right angles; so that the form of the town is almost quadrangular; and it is most delightfully situated between a large navigable river on the W. the ocean on the S. and a fine fruitful country on the N. and E. Lat. 18, 5. Long. 69, 30.

DOMINICA, the last of the Leeward Carribee Islands, taking them from N. W. to S. E. but the Spaniards call it the last of the Windward Islands. It is situated much about half way betwixt Guadaloupe on the N. W. and Martinico on the S. E. 15 leagues from each. It extends from N. W. to S. E. and is about $8\frac{1}{2}$ leagues in length, and near 4 where broadest. It derives its name from the first discovery of it being made on a Sunday, November 3, 1593, by Columbus.

It is divided, like Guadaloupe, Martinico, and some of the other Carribee Islands, into the Cabes-terre, and Basse-terre; and the soil is much of the same nature. Its appearance is rugged and mountainous, especially towards the sea, but the ascents easy. The soil is good; and the slopes of the hills, which bear the finest trees in the world, are fit for the production of our plants; so that some have reported it to be one of the best of the Caribbees for its fruitful valleys, large plains, and fine rivulets: and with ease and certainty all the productions of the other West-India islands may be cultivated here. The Cabes-terre is watered with a great number of fresh-water rivers, which abound with excellent fish. Only 2 or 3 places in that called the Basse-terre are tolerable; the principal of which is called the Great Savannah, and situated nearly in the middle of it; namely, the tract from the point facing Martinico, to that which is opposite to the Saints. It produces ananas, mandioca, cassavas, bananas, and the finest figs, which are left to rot on the ground, all but what they eat with their food; and these they gather before they are ripe. They have potatoes and ignamas in abundance, with a great deal of millet and cotton. Here are great numbers of hogs, ring-doves, partridges, and ortolans. They breed hogs and poultry; and of the former are two sorts of wild ones, descended from those that first came from France and Spain. Here are the finest eels in the world, but the Caribbeans never eat them.

The Caribbeans having, for the most part, retired hither, as they were driven out of the other islands by the Europeans, are consequently more numerous here than in any of the rest, being 20,000. The anchorage is good all round the coast of Dominica, but it has no port, or bay for retiring into; and all the advantage it has is the shelter which ships find behind some of its capes. The French have always opposed the attempts of the English for settling on this island, because it would enable them in time of war to cut off the communication between Martinico and Guadaloupe, but it was ceded to them in 1763, at the peace of Paris, and in 1778, the French took it again, in whose hands it remains at present.

The climate is remarkable hot, even for this part of the world, though the air is pure and very thin. Among the mountains it is imagined there is a gold mine, and 2 more towards the S. end of the island, called Souffrieres, from the plenty of sulphur they contain. They have also several springs of mineral waters, whose virtues are highly extolled. Its forests afford an inexhaustible quantity of rose-wood, so esteemed by cabinet-makers. Dominica is divided into 10 parishes, 7 to the leeward, and 3 to the windward. On the leeward coast is the capital. Lat. 15, 30. Lat. 60, 30.

DOMITZ, a town of Mecklenburg duchy, in Germany. It stands on an island formed by the confluence of the Elbe and Elda. At a fort here ships are obliged to pay toll, and it is accessible only by a wooden bridge. It has been often taken. It lies 28 miles S. of Swerin. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 11, 41, E.

DOMOLK, a considerable Benedictine abbey, in the Hither Circle of the Danube in Lower Hungary. In its neighbourhood stands a village, at the foot of Mount Sag, which yields very good wine. At this place is a celebrated image of the Virgin Mary.

DOMPAIRE, an ancient town of Lorrain, where the kings of Austrasia, and the dukes of Lorrain had their residence, now reduced to almost a village.

DOM-REMY, with the addition of La Pucelle, a village of Bassigny, in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. Here the famous Joan (Jeanne,) of Arc, or Maid of Orleans, was born; who, for the signal services she performed to king Charles Charles VII. against the English, got the whole provostship of Vaucouleurs, and an exemption from all taxes. In this neighbourhood is the boundary-stone to be seen, which the emperor Henry II. and king Robert erected, to shew the limits of their respective countries.

DON, a considerable river of European Russia. Its Latin name is Tanais, and the Tartars call it Tuna or Duna. The ancients reckoned it among the principal streams, and took it for the boundary between Europe and Asia. Not far from Tula it issues from the Jwano-Osero, i. e. John's-lake; at first it runs from N. to S. and after it has united with the Sosna near fort Nowa Pawlowskaja, in the government of Woronez, gone a great way from W. to E. and made several considerable windings, it turns again from N. to S. Not far from Tscherkask it parts into 2 main branches; of which the principal and southern retains the name of Don; but the northern is by the Russians called Donez, or Little Don; and is easy to be distinguished from the Great Donez, which farther up falls into the Don. These branches begin to widen below Czerkaskoi, (Tscherkask,) and fall into the Palus Mœtis; its water is muddy, whitish, and likewise unwholesome; in summer it is very shallow, and full of sand-banks.

It has an exuberance of great and small fish; and is so high the Volga, that their smallest distance is no more than 140 wersts, that is, about 50 or 60 English miles. But when the river Lawla, which empties itself into the Don, and the Camischinka, which falls into the Volga, shall be made navigable, there will then be only a space of 4 wersts, or about 2 miles, between these 2 great rivers; so that upon cutting a channel through this piece of ground they may be easily joined. But this was an enterprise which Czar Peter the Great, it is said, could not accomplish, and was therefore obliged to leave it unfinished.

DON, a river in Aberdeenshire, in Scotland, upon which stands the old town of Aberdeen, and famous for salmon.

DONNACHADEE, a port in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, where the packets from Scotland commonly land, and by the resort of passengers has some sort of trade. It is the residence of a collector of his Majesty's customs, and another of the excise. It lies 15 miles from Port-Patrick.

DONAT, (St.) a fortress of Dutch Flanders. It lies a little to the W. of Sluys.

DONAWERT, or THONAWERT, in Latin, Insula Danubii, a town of Bavaria, in Germany, on the N. side of the Danube, near the confluence of the Wernitz with it, where it has a bridge. Being near the road from Augsburg, it is much frequented; besides, all that go up or down the Danube, are obliged to pay a toll to the town. It was twice taken by the Swedes. And at Schillenbourg, near this place, in 1704, the Duke of Marlborough forced a strong pass in the French and Bavarian entrenchments, which was one of the warmest services in queen Anne's wars. It lies 36 miles N. E. of Ulm, and 30 W. of Ingolstadt. Lat. 48, 32, N. Long. 10, 32, E.

DONCASTER, a large, genteel, and populous mayor-town, in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Dun. Here a considerable manufacture is carried on, particularly in stockings, gloves, and knit waistcoats. It is a great thoroughfare on the northern post-road. At the end of the town is a remarkable old cross, with a Norman inscription upon it. Here the remains of the great Roman way are visible, and over the river are 2 stone-bridges, with a long causeway beyond each. A handsome town-house has been built lately in this place, where is but one church, though large, and with a stately tower; also an hospital plentifully endowed. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fairs on April 5, and August 5. It lies 30 miles S. of York, and 155 N. of London.

DONCHERY, a town of Lower Champagne, in France, on the Meuse, which Lewis XIV. caused to be surrounded with strong walls and half bastions. Here is a provostship, salt-granary, and a particular governor.

DONDAUGEN, a castle in the district of Piltten, and duchy of Courland. To its jurisdiction belong 10 villages, among which Austruppen has a fine mineral spring.

DONEGAL, a county of Ireland, which is 68 miles in length, and 44 in breadth; bounded on the E. by Londonderry and Tyrone, and on the W. and N. by the ocean, and on the S. by Fermanagh, and the bay of Donegal. It contains 10,789 houses, 40 parishes, 5 baronies, 5 boroughs, and sends 12 members to parliament. It is in general, a champion country, and abounds with harbours; the principal town is of the same name.

DONES, one of the branches into which the Don, in European Russia, is divided. See DON.

DONGOLA, or DANGOLA, supposed to be the ancient Tenupsis of Pliny, now the metropolis of the Nubian kingdom, situated on the eastern banks of the Nile, near the borders of Garga. It is said to be very populous, and to contain about 100,000 houses, though most of them are mean, and built only of wood and mud. The inhabitants however are rich, and drive a considerable commerce with Cairo, and other parts of Egypt, where they exchange their own commodities, especially saunders and musk, for arms, linen-cloth, and other wares. Lat. 19, 10, N. Long. 31, 20, E.

DONETZ, or LITTLE TANAIs, a river of Scythia.

DONEZAN, a sovereign territory, in the government of Foix, in France. It is 3 leagues in length, and the same in breadth. It is not immediately joined by Foix, but parted from it by mountains. Henry IV. annexed it to the crown.

DONNINTON, in Lincolnshire, has fairs on May 26, August 27, September 6, and October, 17, with a market on Saturday.

DONNINGTON, a ruinous castle in Berkshire, on the brow of a hill, washed by the little river Lambourne, famous for having been the seat of Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, the father of English poetry; the inhabitants still shew a place, where stood an oak, in the memory of some living, called Chaucer's oak, under which he used to sit and compose verses.

DONY, or BONY, in S. Guinea, stands on the E. side of St. Domingo river, and is large, well-peopled, and trades in slaves and teeth, with the Europeans by means of Bandy-river, which has a communication with it, and by means of those rivers the Dony people drive their trade up the land to purchase slaves and teeth.

DONZY, the capital of Donziois, in the government of Nivernois, in France. It stands on the river Nohin, and has a collegiate church, priory, convent, and hospital. It lies 3 leagues from the Loire. Lat. 4, 22, N. Long. 3, 30, E.

DORAT, a town of Lower la Marche, in France, on the Seurre, where is a royal castleward, and a collegiate church. It lies 18 miles N. of Limoges. Lat. 46, 21, N. Long. 1 15, E.

DORCHESTER, in Dorsetshire, the shire-town, 6 miles from the sea, 124 miles from London, was the most considerable station of the Romans in these parts. It had 2 mints in the time of the Saxons, and a castle, which was demolished by the Danes; but after the Norman conquest a new one was erected, of which the greatest of the barons used to be governors. It is bounded on the N. side by the Frome river, beyond which are fine meadows, and warm sandy lands, and on the S. W. are pleasant chalky downs. Here are 3 churches, a town-hall, shire-hall, and the county-jail, with its chapel. There are few towns in England better paved and built, and the view of it is every way delightful.

Here was a dreadful fire, August 6, 1613, which consumed 2 of the churches since rebuilt, and about 300 houses, to the damage of 200,000l. yet not a soul perished in it. The streets are wide and clean, the inns large, the markets and fairs well frequented, and the toll of both is vested in the corporation, who hold the manor of the borough at a fee-farm rent from the crown. King James I. empowered them to choose a recorder, and by charter of king Charles I. they have a mayor, 2 bailiffs, 6 aldermen, and 6 capital burgeses; besides whom, there is a governor yearly chosen by 24 common-council, whose office is chiefly to look after the trade of the town. Here are a charity-school, and 3 alms-houses. The Roman Ikening-street, which enters this place, by the N. of Winterburn, at West-gate, is plainly traced here, and the foundations of the Roman walls appear quite round the town, and though on the E. side a street is built on it, and the ditch filled up, yet it is still called the Walls. The Romans had an amphitheatre near it, which is now called Mawmbury, and the terrace upon it is a noted place of rendezvous, here being a fine prospect of the town and country. It was one of the winter stations of the Roman legions; and many Roman coins have been dug up here, particularly king Dor's money, called Dorm-money.

The assizes and quarter-sessions, and the election of the knights of the shire are held here. This town is noted for excellent beer and cakes, and it used to send great quantities of malt to Bristol. It has almost lost the manufacture of broad-cloth, for which it was once so famous, and its serge trade is not very considerable, but great profit is made here by their sheep, of which it is said that not less than 60,000 are fed within 6 miles of the town. Their downs abound with thyme and other aromatic herbage, so nourishing, that their ewes generally bring 2 lambs; for which reason, they are bought up by all the farmers of the E. part by England, who carry them to Bedfordshire, Bucks, Oxfordshire, and to Kent and Surrey; and even Banstead-downs, so famous for good mutton, are supplied from hence. This town has sent members to parliament ever since the original demand of burgeses in the reign of Edward I. The market is on Saturday; fairs, February 2, Trinity-Monday, July 5, and August 5.

DORCHESTER, in Oxfordshire, 6 miles from Abingdon, and 10 from Oxford, has a bridge over the Thames, and by the coins and medals often dug up in and near it, it was an ancient city of the Britons, and also a Roman station. It was the see of a bishop near 500 years, till in the reign of William the Conqueror, it was translated to Lincoln; and it had once 5 stately churches, though now but one, and since the loss of the see, and turning the high-road to London another way, it is become only a village with a fair on Easter-Tuesday.

DORCHESTER, a little town of Berkeley county, on the confines of Colleton county, and province province of Carolina, in N. America. It contains about 350 souls, and in it is an independent meeting-house. Lat. 36, 10, N. Long. 79, 20, W.

DORCHESTER, one of the 5 counties on the E. side of the Delaware bay, in the province of Maryland, in North America. It is situated to the S. of Talbot county. Its principal parish bears also the same name, where the county-court is kept, and is a small place of about 10 houses. The land here lying to the N. side of Nantikoke-river, beginning at the mouth of Chickacoan-river, and so up to its source, and from thence to the head of Anderton-branch, and down to the N. W. fork, and to the mouth of the said Chickacoan-river, was, by an act of the assembly, anno 1698, declared to belong to Panquash, and Annatouquem, 2 Indian kings, and the people under their government, their heirs and successors for ever, to be holden by the lord proprietary, under the yearly rent of one beaver skin. More Indian towns are in this than in any other of the counties.

DORCHESTER, a town of Suffolk county, in New England, in North America. It is for magnitude the next to Boston, and built at the mouth of 2 small rivers, contiguous to the sea side. It sends 4 members to the assembly, and has 2 fairs; the one on the fourth Tuesday in March, and the other on the last Wednesday in October. From this place the Americans bombarded Boston in 1776.

DORDOGNE, a river of Limosin, in France, which rising in the mountains of Auvergne, and running W. through Guyenne, divides Limosin from Auvergne and Quercy. It falls into the Garonne, about 15 miles below Bourdeaux.

DORESTERO, in Latin Silistria, or Dorostolus, a large and strong town of Bulgaria, in European Turkey, on the Danube. Here a metropolitan resides. It stands not far from the remains of the wall, which the Greek emperors formerly raised, for preventing the incursions of the barbarous nations; and its architecture seems to be Roman.

DORIA BALTEA, anciently Druria, one of the rivers of Piemont, in Upper Italy, which empties its stream into the Po.

DORIS, an ancient kingdom or province of Græcia Propria, was situated on the S. of Theffaly, being parted from it by mount Oeta and a ridge of other hills. It had on the S. Phocis and part of Ætolia. On the E. it was parted from the Locri Epicnemidæ by the river Pindus, and W. from Epirus by that of Achelous. Other rivers of note they had not. Mountains they had in great numbers, and not inconsiderable. The most famed were Oeta and Pindus, which, with some of less note, surrounded them on the N. as the Callidromians did on the W. Yet they abounded with spacious and very fruitful plains. The air was sweet and healthy, and their soil capable of being improved to all the advantages of husbandry.

DORMANS, a town of Upper Champagne, in France, on the river Marne. The manor of the same name, partly in Champagne, and partly in Brie, worth about 24,000 livres per annum, was erected into a county by Lewis XIV. in favour of M. de Broglie, then lieutenant-general of his armies. It lies 6 leagues from Espernay, and 12 from Chalons on the W.

DORNECK, a place in Solothurn, one of the Swiss Cantons, where is a magnificent stone bridge over the Aar. In 1499, the Swiss here defeated the Germans after a great slaughter, whereby the emperor Maximillian was obliged to sue for peace, which was granted: so that the war begun and ended in the same campaign.

DORNFIELD, or DRONFIELD, a market-town in Derbyshire, at the extremity of the Peak. Here are held 3 annual fairs, January 10, April 14, and July 15.

DORNOCK, the county-town of Sutherlandshire, in the N. of Scotland. It is a provost town, and royal burgh, which with Dingwall, Tayne, Weik and Kirkwall, sends alternately a member to the British parliament. It stands on the Murray frith; and that branch of it, called the frith of Dornock or Tayne, commonly the Muckle Ferry, as the Little Ferry is between that and Dunrobin-castle, and something N. of the burgh of the latter name, and on the opposite side. It was formerly the see of a bishop, and here was a cathedral for the diocese of Caithness, also a castle for the earl of Sutherland: and here also is the family burying-place. Dornock is the seat of a presbytery, containing 9 parishes. Four annual fairs are held here, which are much frequented. At the end of the town is a sort of monument, unless it was formerly the market-cross, called Thanes, or Earl's Cross. Not far from Embo in this neighbourhood is another stone cross, which was erected for a Danish king, who was killed and buried there. Dornock lies 4 Scotch miles N. of Tayne, including half a mile for the ferry, which branches up from the Murray frith, and lies 130 miles N. of Edinburgh. This place is now remarkable for nothing but its antiquity: they have plenty of fish, and but little or no trade.

DORO CAPE, in the island of Eubœa, or Negropont, in the Ægean Sea, 4 or 5 miles to N. E. of Caristo, is otherwise called Del Oro, or Figera, anciently Faphareum, or Caphireum Promontorium. It is so surrounded with rocks, that it is dangerous for ships to come near it.

DOROG, one of the seven Heyduc towns, in the Further Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary, gary, which Mathias II. exempted from the jurisdiction of its county of Szabolc, on account of their bravery; but these have declined much for want of inhabitants; yet the ancient privileges were renewed in 1746.

DORPT, DORPAT, or DERPT, a town in the duchies of Livonia and Esthonia in European Russia. It stands on the river Embeck, which forms a communication between the lakes Worsero and Pepus, and in the diocese or circle of the same name; also called Odepoa. It was formerly the see of a bishop, and had a cathedral, being in a flourishing condition; and, when a member of the Hanseatic Union, by means of the ferry between it and Pernau, carried on a considerable trade by sea. Here also was an English staple, and a magazine for the goods of that country; and an university, founded by Gustavus Adolphus, till removed to Pernau, which also has quite declined. The inhabitants were in good circumstances, and the place had handsome stone-houses: but all this is no more; for it has been very much reduced by the frequent sieges, storms, and captures, which it has undergone at different times, particularly in 1704, and 1708, when the Russians took the place, carried away the inhabitants prisoners into Siberia, burnt the town, and made it a heap of ruins; and it continues almost in the same condition, as it is still in the possession of the Russians; before which time, the Teutonic Knights, Poles and Swedes, were successively masters of it. It lies 35 miles S. of Narva. Lat. 58, 20, N. Long. 28, 14, E.

DORSETSHIRE, a county of England, bounded on the S. by the English Channel, on the N. by Somersetshire and Wiltshire, on the E. by Hampshire, and on the W. by Devonshire and some part of Somersetshire. It is between 40 and 50 miles long from E. to W. and 34 broad from S. to N. and contains 34 hundreds, 22 market-towns, 248 parishes. This county enjoys a mild, pleasant, and wholesome air, and a deep, rich, and fertile soil, finely diversified. Towards the N. it is level, under the high lands that divide it from Somersetshire, where there are fine arable grounds that will yield large crops of different kinds of grain. But on the S. on the borders of Hampshire by the sea-coast, for an extent of almost 20 miles in length, and in some places 4 or 5 in breadth, is an heathy common, which renders this county less populous than it otherwise would be. From E. to W. run a ridge of hills called the Downs, abounding with sweet and short herbage, which nourishes a vast number of sheep, equally esteemed for their flesh and fleece. The county is also very plentifully watered; and in all respects so well suited both for pleasure and profit, that it was distinguished by the Romans above all others. They had more stations and summer-camps in Dorsetshire than in any other county. That the Saxons had the same regard for it, is evident from the number of palaces they had in it, the stately ministers they built, and the express directions they gave that their bodies should be interred in those monuments of their piety. This county yields many and very valuable commodities. The quarries in Purbeck and Portland supply stones of different qualities, suited to various uses, and in prodigious quantities, together with some very rich and beautiful marble. The best tobacco-pipe clay in England is dug about Pool and Wareham. Its principal rivers are the Stower, Frome, Piddle, Lyddon, Dulish, and Allen, which supply all sorts of river-fish, as the ports furnish those of the sea, and the rocks on the coast samphire and eringo. This county has plenty of wild fowl, and all sorts of game; so that it has been often stiled the garden of England. It is of note for its fine October beer; great quantities of which are drank in London.

The following are the dimensions of the giant cut out on the side of a very steep hill, near Cerne, in this county. This monstrous figure, viewed from the opposite hill, appears almost erect, with a huge crab-tree club in his hand, raised over his head, just going to strike a blow, which seems sufficient, as it were, to overturn a mountain. It is supposed to be above a thousand years standing, as there is a date between its legs, and the figures are not legible. It is plain there were but 3 figures; so that, supposing the first to be 9, it must have been formed a long while ago. Some think it was cut by the ancient Britons. Length of his foot, 18 feet; breadth of the same, 8; ditto of the small of the leg, $5\frac{1}{2}$; breadth of the calf, 9; breadth of the thigh, $17\frac{1}{2}$; length of the leg and thigh, 80; from the top of the thigh to the top of the head, 99; whole length, 180; breadth of the face, 14; breadth of the chin, 4; breadth of the mouth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; length of the nose, $5\frac{1}{2}$; breadth of the nose, $2\frac{1}{2}$; length of the face, 22; diameter of the eye, $2\frac{1}{2}$; diameter of his breasts, 5; length of his ribs, 18; length of the fingers, $5\frac{1}{2}$; breadth of the fingers, $1\frac{1}{2}$; Breadth of the hand, $7\frac{1}{2}$; breadth of the wrist, 5; from the wrist to the elbow, 41; from the elbow to the shoulder, $60\frac{1}{2}$; length of the arm, 109; breadth of the shoulder, 22; breadth of the elbow, 19; length of the club, 121; breadth at the knots, 22; breadth at other places, 11.

DORSTAN, a town in the Marck of Westphalia, in Germany, on the river Lippe. It lies 30 miles E. of Guelder. It belongs to the elector of Triers. Lat. 51, 27, N. Long. 6, 38, E.

DORSTONE, a village in Herefordshire, 10 miles W. of Hereford, with 4 fairs, on April 27, May

May 18, September 27, and November 18, for horned cattle, horses, sheep, and pigs.

DORT, by abbreviation, but at full length DORDRECHT, in Latin Dordrachum, a large and populous city of Holland Proper. It stands on that branch of the Maes, called the Meruwe, in an island formed by an inundation of the sea, which in 1421 swallowed up 70 villages and 100,000 people. This city was formerly famous for the English trade, as it is now for Rhenish wine and floats of timber from Germany, both carried down on the Rhine. Here they spin the best linen thread; and they have several refiners for salt. From the steeple of the principal church, is a prospect as far as Breda. In the Gunner's hall sat the famous synod which takes the name of this place, where, in 1718, they condemned Arminius and his followers. To this assembly king James I. sent some deputies. It lies 15 miles E. of Rotterdam. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 4, 36, E.

DORTMUND, in Latin, Tremonia, or Dormania, an imperial and Hanse town, and the capital of the mark of Westphalia, in Germany, situated on the Empster; through its communication with the Rhine, it is rich and populous, having a pretty good trade; and it stands almost in the middle, between the Lippe and Roer, hardly 6 miles from either, and lies 28 N. E. of Dusseldorp. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 6, 46, E.

DOS INDOS, an Indian town in the province of Chiapa, in the audience of Guatemala, New Spain, S. America, which may be regarded as the metropolis of the original Mexicans. It is pleasantly situated on the banks of a river, and supposed to contain 20,000 inhabitants, who are industrious, intelligent, and of a friendly and amiable disposition. Their character is the best refutation of those philosophers, who would represent the native Americans, from reasonings founded on their depressed state, as an inferior order of human beings; and is sufficient to convince the Spaniards, that they would have derived more essential advantages from treating the Indians as fellow-creatures, than as beasts of burden.

The inhabitants are not only peculiarly expert at all kinds of martial exercises, in which they frequently employ themselves, but they are also painters, musicians, and poets. They have their theatres and other public amusements, and are particularly ingenious in making of pictures and cloths of feathers, after the manner of their ancestors; and figured stuffs of different coloured wool, which the best manufacturers in Europe need not be ashamed of. The spirit which inspires them with this elegance and ingenuity, they owe to their exemption from servitude, and that partly to the barrenness of their country in mines, and partly to the famous Las Casas, their bishop, who protected them against oppression, while alive, and obtained privileges for them which the Spaniards have always respected.

DOTECUM, a small but walled town, not of any great strength. It is situated in the county of Zutphen, in Guelderland, upon the eastern bank of of the Yssel, 6 miles above Doesburg.

DOUAY, a pretty large and well-fortified city of French Flanders, with a fort, on the river Scarpe. The town, besides, lies amidst marshes, and by means of sluices, the whole country round it can be laid under water. Here is the seat of a parliament for all the French Netherlands, except Gravelines and Bourbourg; both which, are under the council at Arras: also a bailiwick, university, famous English seminary, a collegiate church, and 7 parishes. Its principal trade consists in making and vending of worsted camblets, which are bought at the annual fair in September. Here is a military governor and king's lieutenant, &c. besides a particular governor for fort Scarpe. This city was taken by the French in 1667, and retaken by the allies June 10, 1710, after the loss of a great many men, but the French took it again in 1712, after the suspension of arms. It lies 20 miles S. of Lille. Lat. 50, 27, N. Long. 3, 15, E.

DOUE, a town of Anjou in France. Lat. 47, 22, N. Long. 20, W. See DOE.

DOVE, a river, which after dividing Derbyshire from Staffordshire, falls into the Trent near Burton.

DOVERIDGE, in Warwickshire, anciently a Roman station, called Tripontium, where the Avon runs by Rugby to Warwick. The stream here divides into two branches, over each of which is a bridge.

DOVER, in Kent, 15 miles from Canterbury, and 72 miles from London, 285 from the Land's-End in Cornwall, and 25 from Calais in France; is one of the cinque-ports, whose situation is perfectly romantic, in a valley under a semi-circle of hills, and is the only one about the coast where water is admitted inwards of the cliffs, which are here very high, and abound with samphire. It had once 7 churches, now but 2, and had several religious houses. It was also walled, and had 10 gates; and the passage from hence to France being nearer than from any port in England, there was a law formerly that none should go to it from hence. Our packet-boats go from hence to France and Flanders. It is a populous place and noted for its tide-harbour. It was incorporated in the reign of Edward the Confessor, by the title of mayor and commonalty, and the townsmen were called burgeses, from whom the mayor chose assistants for the year, who being sworn to faithful service, were called jurats, which name and office are now common to all the cinque-ports.

The courts of chancery, admiralty, &c, relating to them all, are kept in St. James's church, and here are a custom-house and victualling-office. One of the streets is called Snare-gate, from the dreadful rocks of chalk that hang over it. On a neighbouring steep rock, or chalky-hill, stands the castle, which is its chief glory, and was so fortified in the Saxons time, that it was reckoned the lock and key of England, but it is too high to hurt any ship at sea, and could not stand a formal siege on the land-side half a day, though the area of its fortification is 30 acres. It is said to have been begun by Julius Cæsar, and finished by Claudius. The well here, which is 60 fathoms deep, is said to be the work of Julius. It is round, and lined to the bottom with free-stone, and the water is drawn out of it by a wheel in which men work.

In queen Anne's wars there was no less than 1500 prisoners in this castle at one time. Here is a brass gun of 22 feet, the longest in the world, and of the most curious workmanship, which was presented by the States of Utrecht to queen Elizabeth, and is called her Pocket-pistol; it requires 15 pounds of powder, and will carry a ball, they say, 7 miles. At the W. end of an old church here, said to have been built by Lucius the first Christian king in Britain, there is a Roman Pharos, or watch-tower; and upon another rock against the castle, are the remains of another watch-tower, called Bredemscone, and by the vulgar the Devil's Drop, from the strength of the mortar. Here the constable of the castle is sworn. Soon after the Conquest, great part of the town was destroyed by fire, as it was also in the reign of Edward I. by the French, who landed in the night.

By the Romans this town was named Dubris, and by the Saxons Dofra, probably from the British word Dour, which signifies water. The convenience of its situation drew the attention of the Roman governors, who ruled here while they possessed this part of the island; and there still remain indubitable testimonies of their care and respect for this important place. For the defence of the town, the Romans, or, according to some, Arviragus, a British king, their confederate, by cutting out walls with infinite labour in the solid rock, constructed a stony fortress; and as its venerable remains still prove, erected also a light-house for the benefit of navigation. The Saxons, Danes, and Normans, had a very high opinion of this place; and when the barons invited over the young prince, afterwards Lewis VIII. of France, his father, Philip Augustus conceived a bad opinion of the expedition, because the castle and port of Dover were held for king John, though a great part of the kingdom had submitted to Lewis. In its most flourishing state the fortress was impregnable, and the town a very opulent emporium. The decay of the town was brought on by that of the harbour. To recover this, Henry VIII. spent no less than 63,000l. in constructing piers, and 5000l. in building a castle between this and Folkestone, called Sandgate; where the shore was flat, and the landing easy. Notwithstanding all this expence, however, it was again choaked up in the reign of queen Elizabeth, by whom it was again cleared at a vast expence, so that ships of some hundred tons could enter it. Since that time it has again declined, and though the parliament in king William's reign gave 10,000l. to improve it, yet it is only fit for small ships, and that at high water, which lay afloat in the basin. The ships which carry freight from Virginia and New-York, to Holland, used to unlade their goods here to enter them at the custom-house, and pay the duties; after which they reloaded them, drew back the duty by debenture, and then proceeded to Holland.

Dover, when in the height of its prosperity, had 21 wards, of which each furnished a ship a year, and maintained it 40 days at its own expence; in consideration whereof each ward had a licensed packet-boat. According to the Tower records, the fare was thus settled, in the reign of Richard II. viz. for a single person in summer 6d. in winter 1s. for a horse 1s. 6d. in winter 2s. The market here is on Wednesday and Saturday; fair November 22. The Roman Watling-street, coming freight from Canterbury, over Barham-Down, enters this place at Biggin-gate. There are some remains of the town-walls, and also of a priory here, which is now a farm-house; and that which was the Knights Templars house over against it is made a store-house. The piers which form the haven, are costly great works, and above is a fort with 4 bastions. The broad beach, which lies at the mouth of it, and was the harbour in Cæsar's time, is very delightful, as the sight of the bottom from the adjacent cliffs is dreadful.

On one of the 2 piers that form the entrance of the harbour, is a look-out house, where pilots always attend to pilot ships coming from the westward, bound northward, or to London; and in consequence of a regulation observed since the 1st of October, 1772, as soon as there are from 9 to 10 feet water in the harbour of Dover, notice is given of it by a flag in the day-time, and a lanthorn during the night, which they keep hoisted till the water is come down again to that height, when they strike the flag or lanthorn. Many fine cutters belong to this town, which when not employed in bringing mackarel to London, or for privateers in war-time, follow smuggling, which is the chief support of

of the place, as every house almost is a ware-house for contraband goods.

DOVER-STRAITS, (called by the French Le Pas de Calais) are bounded on the English side by that part of the Kentish coast, which extends about 2 leagues in a south direction, between the South Foreland and Dover; on the French side is bounded by the coast of Picardy, running from Calais to Cape Grisnes, S. by W. 4 leagues. The width of this channel is not much above 18 miles; but from the S. Foreland to Calais, there are about 22; and from Dover to Calais about 21. The distance between Calais and the castle of Dover, was geometrically ascertained in 1681, by Messrs. Picart and La Hire, two excellent astronomers of the Royal Academy of Sciences. In the morning of the 20th of November, when the sea was very low, they measured upon the strand of the harbour of Calais, a line drawn from the point of the bastion of the Rifbank next the sea towards Boulogne, of 10,000 French toises. Having placed a quadrant at the point of this bastion, and observed the angle which the measured basis made with the intermediate point between the two most visible towers of the castle of Dover, they found it to be 37 deg. 58 min. then removing the instrument to the other extremity of the base line towards Boulogne, they measured the other angle, and found it 137 deg. 30 min. whence they concluded that the vertical angle at the castle of Dover, must be 4 deg. 30 min. and consequently the distance between the point of the above-mentioned bastion of the Rifbank of Calais, and the castle of Dover, 21,363 French toises. Now, according to the learned D'Anville, the English statute mile being equal to 826 toises, this distance will be above $24\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles, and very near $21\frac{1}{2}$ nautic miles, supposing the degree of a great circle to contain 57,060 toises. The run from Dover to Calais, (says Mr. Dutens, in his useful Itineraire de l'Europe) "is shorter than that from Calais to Dover, because in the first case the tide is always more favourable; three, four, or five hours make a good passage; I have crossed it 20 times, and have never been above 12 hours. Six hours is the most common."

The tide in the Straits sets N. E. by E. and S. W. by W. the flood running towards N. E. and E. N. E. and the ebb S. W. and W. S. W.

Father Gouge, the Jesuit, a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences in the year, 1712, communicated to that society, an observation made by a sailor, who by sounding in this channel, had found that the water rose higher in the middle, during the ebbing tide, on the opposite shore, than at the time of high water.

This phenomenon at first seemed strange, but after a little consideration, it appeared very reasonable, that the waters which returned from the coast of England, and those that came from the coast of France, at the same time, meeting in the middle, should support one another, and consequently increase the depth of the channel. And indeed, without being well versed in the theory of the tides, it is obvious from the nature of water, that the less room it takes, the deeper it must be. Since therefore the waters of any sea whatever occupy a less space while the tide ebbs, than while it flows towards the shores, it seems plain, that it must be deeper in the former than the latter case.

The depths of the Strait is from 18 and 20 to 24 fathoms water, fine sand; along the French coast at a league's distance from land, you have 18 or 19 fathoms, and in the middle of the channel, 23 or 24; but towards the English coast it grows shallower.

DOVER, formerly St. John's town, the capital of Kent county, in Pennsylvania, in N. America.

DOUGLAS, a river below Lanerk, in the shire of Clydesdale, and S. of Scotland, which falls into the Clyde, and gives the name of Douglassdale to the lands it washes. In a valley near this river stands a very old castle, which had been the paternal seat of the dukes of Douglas for above 1000 years, and therefore kept in repair; but by the frequent additions to the building, it became an irregular mass, though the apartments were very noble, but it was totally destroyed by an accidental fire December 11, 1758. Of the same name is a town just by.

DOUGLAS. See MAN, (isle of.)

DOUGLAS, a town of Massachusetts-Bay, in Worcester county, New England.

DOULENS, or DOURLENS, in Latin, Donincum, or Doningium, a town of Picardy, in France, on the river Authie. It is the capital of an election, the seat of a royal provostship and salt-granary. It has a strong citadel, three parish-churches, an abbey, two hospitals, and a community. It lies 20 miles N. of Amiens. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 2, 27, E.

DOURAK, a town of Persia, seated near the confluence of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, and remarkable for the reed of which they make their pens. Long. 56, 7, E. Lat. 32, 15, N.

DOURDAN, in Latin, Dordinga, a town in the Isle of France, upon the river Orge, (Urbia), with a particular governor, provostship, bailiwick, and forest-court; also two parishes, a community, hospital, and without the town a priory. Here they manufacture fine silk and woollen stockings. It lies two or three leagues from Estampes on the W.

DOURLENS. See DOULENS.

DOURO, or DUBRO, a river of Portugal, which which rising in the N. E. part of Old Castile, a province of Spain, runs from thence to Valladolid, crossing Leon; and then passing by Toro and Zamora, enters Portugal near the town of Miranda, its course being mostly between mountains. It divides the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal, and after receiving the small rivers Coa, Sabor, Tua, Tavora, Paiva, Tamega, and others, having crossed Portugal, it empties itself into the Atlantic ocean, below the town of Porto. Near the village of S. Joan de Pasquera it first becomes navigable. It is said formerly to have yielded gold in its sands, out of which king John III. they say, had a sceptre made.

DOUX, a considerable river of Franche Comté, one of the governments of France.

DOVOLS, a river in Northumberland, which runs into the Tyne by Dilton.

DOVY, or TAVY, a river in Merionethshire, Montgomeryshire, and Cardiganhire, which runs into the Irish sea at Aberdawy.

DOW, a river in Yorkshire, which runs into the Hodgebrook, near Edston.

DOWGLAS, a river in Lancashire, which runs into the Ribble at Hesketh.

DOWHIRTA, a small isle of the Hebrides, in Scotland, lying W. of that of Oranfa. The natives have a tradition among them, that pigmies once lived here.

DOWN, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded on the E. and S. by St. George's channel; on the W. by the county of Armagh; and on the N. by the county of Antrim. It lies opposite to the Isle of Man, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and the N. part of it fronts the Mull of Galloway in Scotland, and is about 44 miles from it. It is about 44 miles in length, and 30 in breadth. It sends 14 members to parliament, two for the county, and 12 for the following boroughs, Down-Patrick, Newry, Newton, Killeleagh, Bangor, and Hillsborough.

This county is rough and full of hills, and yet the air is temperate and healthy. The soil naturally produces wood, unless constantly kept open and ploughed; and the low grounds degenerate into bogs and moss, where the drains are neglected. But by the industry of the inhabitants, it produces good crops of corn, particularly oats; and, where marle is found, barley. This last is exported from Killelough to Dublin. The staple commodity of this county is the linen manufacture.

DOWN, or DOWN-PATRICK, a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, one of the most ancient in that kingdom. It is a market-town and a bishopric, said to be erected in the fifth century by St. Patrick, but is now united to the see of Connor. Within 200 paces of the town, on the ascent of a hill, are the ruins of an old cathedral, remarkable for the tomb of St. Patrick, the founder, in which they say the bodies of St. Bridget and St. Columb are also laid. The town, which is seated on the S. Corner of Lough Coin, now called the Lake of Strangford, is adorned with several handsome public buildings. Among the hills, and in many islands, are flights of swans and other waterfowl; and the lough abounds with salmon, mullets, and other sea-fish. About a mile from this town is St. Patrick's well, which many people frequent to drink at some seasons of the year, and others to perform a penance enjoined them by the popish priests. The linen manufacture is carried on here, as it is in several places in this county. Long, 5, 50, W. Lat. 54, 23, N.

DOWNS, a well-known road near Deal in Kent, for all ships that arrive from foreign parts, and bound to London; also for all outward-bound vessels that are to pass the Channel. It is rendered a safe anchoring place by the South Foreland, which is the E. point of the Kentish shore, and so called, as being opposite to that called the North Foreland. The former breaks the sea off; that otherwise would come rolling up to the Goodwin-sands; which, about a league and a half distant from the shore, run about 3 leagues parallel with it, and are dry at low water: so that both these secure this road on S. E. and S. W. yet ships have been often driven from their anchors, and run on shore on the said sands, or into Sandwich bay, or Ramsgate, when the wind has blown hard a S. S. E. by N. or E. N. E. and some other points. An unhappy instance of this was in the great storm of November 1703, when 4 capital ships of the royal navy, with almost their whole crews, were lost. This is also the usual place of rendezvous for ships of war. The road is chiefly from a-breast of the S. end of Deal town, away to the northward as far as Sandown castle; or farther N. where it is called the Small, or North Downs, according to the draught of water of the ships.

The two Forelands bear from each other S. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. and N. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. distant about 13 miles. The North Foreland is 2 miles and a half long, in a direction N. N. W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. and S. S. E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. It comprehends 3 points, the northernmost of which is called Fore-ness, by some Fairness; the middlemost, White-ness; and the southernmost, East-ness. This last, which is properly the North Foreland, has a lighthouse half a mile to the westward. The South Foreland is a single round point, with a ledge of rocks running off from it about 3 quarters of a mile E. S. E. nearly. On this point are 2 lighthouses, bearing from each other about E. by N. and and W. by S. The lowermost stands near 3 quarters of a mile from the Foreland, and the uppermost near half a mile farther.

DOWNTON, or DUNKTON, a mayor-borough of Wiltshire, 6 miles from Salisbury, and 84 from London. It sends 2 members to parliament, and stands on the Avon. Its market is held on Friday; and it has 2 annual fairs, on April 20, and October 2, for sheep and horses.

DRAC, one of the rivers of Dauphiny, in France, which falls into the Isere.

DRACONTIA, an island on the coast of Africa Propria, to N. of Hippo Diarrhytus, according to Ptolemy. Two little flat contiguous islands called the Cani, not far from Cape Blanco, seem at this day to bid fair for the same situation that he assigns to this Insula Dracontia.

DRAGOE, a village, but with the appearance of a small town, on the island of Amack, and in the neighbourhood of Copenhagen, in Seeland, in Denmark. Here dwell upwards of 150 families, partly Danes, and partly Dutch, who maintain themselves by the seafaring business, the fishery, and pilotage.

DRAGONARIA, or DRAGONERA, a small, but episcopal, city of the Upper Capitanate, in the kingdom of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy.

DRAGONERA, one of the small islands round Majorca, in the Mediterranean, about 1200 paces from it; being 1000 paces in length, and 900 in breadth. It is uninhabited, and produces nothing but a bird of prey, called Spaniard, which is good to eat. Upon Mount Popia is a fortress. The name of this island is probably from a certain kind of serpent in it, and which in the Catalan language is called Sargantana.

DRAGUIGNAN, one of the largest towns in the province of the same name, and government of Provence, in France. It is situated in a very fine country, is the seat of a provincial court, viguery, and collection. Here is a collegiate church, 6 convents, and a college.

DRAKE-PORT, so called from Sir Francis Drake, who landing in 1578, at a place in California, in North America, took possession of that country for his mistress, queen Elizabeth, by the name of New Albion, the king of California actually investing him with its sovereignty, and presenting him with his crown of beautiful feathers.

DRAKENSTEIN, (colony of,) in Cafreria, in Africa. It lies E. of that of Stellenbosch, which also lies to the eastward of the Cape of Good Hope. In 1675 great numbers of French Protestants taking sanctuary in Holland, from the persecution raised against them by Lewis XIV. were transported thither at the expence of the Dutch East India company. This colony is as large as all the European Low Countries, but without village or council-house. The farms and houses here are mostly at a considerable distance from one another; and all the public buildings are a church and a water-mill. The former is nearly in the middle of the colony, about 56 English miles from the cape to the N. E.

DRAMANET, a village of Guinea and Negroland, in Africa, on the Senega river. It is said to contain above 4000 inhabitants, mostly Marabouts, or Mahometan teachers, with whom it is easy to trade, being as honest as any negroes of their religion. They go on account of traffic as far as the kingdom of Tombuto, 500 leagues off. From hence they get the gold which they sell the French; but the greatest part they carry to the English settlements on the river Gambia.

DRAMMEN, a large river in the diocese of Christiana, in Norway, which falls into the bay of Christiana. Upon it is Drammenzollplatz, comprehending the 2 towns of Bragnas and Stromsloe, the former on the N. side, and the latter on the S. side of the river. This is one of the largest and most profitable toll-places, or custom-house wharfs, in all Norway; vast quantities of deals, beams, and iron, which are brought from the neighbouring parts, being exported from thence. Both places are commonly called Drammen.

DRANGIANA, a province of ancient Persia, bounded on the S. by Gedrosia, on the E. by Arachosia, on the N. by Aria, and on the W. by Carmania the desert, deriving its name, as some say, from the river Drangius, and by the modern Persians is called Sigistan.

DRAVE, in Latin Dravus, a considerable river, which rising in the archbishopric of Salzburg, in Germany, runs through Stiria and Carinthia, and dividing Hungary from Slavonia, falls into the Danube at Esseeck. Busching has it at Darda, near Peterwaradein. It is a navigable stream, and abounds with fish.

DRAUSENSEE, a large inland lake in the kingdom of Prussia, about seven or eight miles long, and between one and two in breadth. Out of it issues the river Elbing.

DRAXHOLM, a bailiwick of Seeland, in Denmark, including a fruitful peninsula.

In it is an ancient castle of the same name. It was formerly a crown-her, and a pretty strong fortress, in which several state prisoners have been confined; and among these, particularly the wicked earl of Bothwell, husband of the unfortunate Mary queen of Scots, who, from the year 1567, suffered a long imprisonment for his infamous actions.

DRAYTON,

D R

DRAYTON, a market-town of Shropshire. It lies 16 miles from Shrewsbury, and 153 from London.

DREGELY, a fortified castle of the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It stands on a steep rock: the Turks took it in 1593, and it was taken from them in the same year: but they re-took it again in 1649. It belongs to the archbishop of Gran.

DRESDEN, a large city, and the metropolis of the marquisate of Misnia, and of all Saxony, in Germany. Its name is supposed to be from three lakes in the neighbourhood, called Dreyen-seen. This is one of the finest cities in the empire. It has been so fortified at different times, that it is now a strong place. Its bastions are faced with stone, and in some places has a double ditch. The houses are of stone, and high; with broad, well-paved, neat streets, and well lighted at night. Its principal church, which was a cathedral, is a very fair building. Here are large squares; and over the river, which divides Dresden into two parts, the Old and New town, is a stately stone bridge of 17 arches. As this bridge was too narrow for the crowds of people that were continually passing and re-passing, king Augustus, in 1730, caused two walks for foot-passengers to be built, one on each side, in a very wonderful manner, the one for those that go into the city, and the other for those that return back. These are bordered with iron rail-fadoes, of curious workmanship. Upon this bridge a gilded crucifix is placed. At the entrance into New Dresden is the palace of the Indies, so called from having had the most curious furniture from that country; the japan and china only having been valued at 1,000,000 of crowns. The elector's palace, or properly castle, is contiguous to the bridge, at the entrance into the New town. This, though an ancient structure, is nobly furnished; and in a place in it called the Green Vault, is one of the most magnificent and curious collection of rarities in Europe. Near it is a very fine garden, called the Zwerger-garten. The suburbs of Dresden are very extensive. There is a contest betwixt the people of Dresden and those of Halle, which speak the best German. This was the only place which Charles XII. of Sweden could not reduce, when he had laid all the rest of Saxony under contribution.

In 1775 there were reckoned here 90,000 inhabitants, and about 3000 houses; and in the city and its neighbourhood many manufactures are carried on, such as fine cloths, serges, stuffs, stockings, linen, silk, gold and silver, glass, mirrors, cannon, and particularly china; and of the fine arts, statuary, painting, engraving, and enamelling, are carried on in great perfection; and by means of the Elbe, here is a considerable commerce. In 1429, 1491, and 1614, Dresden suffered greatly by fire. In 1756 it was taken by the Prussians; from whom the Austrians took it in 1759, when the suburbs were burnt. The Prussians besieged it again in 1760, but in vain. It lies 70 miles N. W. of Prague, and 90 S. of Berlin. Lat. 51, 12, N. Long. 13, 40, E.

DRESINA, (valley of,) a very delightful spot, in the Vicentino, one of the Venetian provinces, in the Upper Division of Italy. It is very well inhabited, particularly Valdarno and Arzignano, the former of which is the seat of a vicariate, and to its jurisdiction belong 15 villages.

DREUX, the ancient Durrocasses or Durcasses, one of the oldest cities of Gaul. It lies in the Isle of France, at the foot of a mountain, near the little river of Blaise. It is the seat of an election, royal bailiwick, lieutenant of the short robe, a court of justice in eyre, a salt-granary, and marshallea. Here is a particular governor, who resides in the castle of Dreux, where is a beautiful collegiate church; and besides, in the town are two parochial ones, and the same number of convents. Here are manufactured great quantities of woollen cloth, which serve for cloathing the French army. From this place corn and wine are sent to Rouen, and thence exported to Holland, and to England in time of peace.

In 1562, before its gates was fought a memorable battle, between the Catholics, commanded by the constable Montmorency, marshal de St. Andre, and the Duke of Guise; and the Reformed, under the prince of Condé, Coligni, and his brother d'Andelot; when the latter were routed, and Condé taken prisoner. Next year Henry the Great took this place after a siege of 18 days, in which both the besiegers and besieged eminently distinguished themselves by their bravery. It lies 40 miles W. of Paris. Lat. 48, 36, N. Long. 1, 30, W.

DRIFFIELD, (Great and Little,) in the East Riding of Yorkshire, six miles from Kilham, in the road from Beverley. The river Hull rises between them, which passes to the Humber. Fairs, Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, August 26, and September 19.

DRYKIRCHEN, or DUSENBACH, a convent of Upper Alsace, with a church, to which frequent pilgrimages are made.

DRIN, the Black, Drino Negro, or Caradrina, one of the principal rivers of Albania, a province of Turkey in Europe. It falls into a bay of the Adriatic sea, near Alesjo.

DRINAWARD, a town of Turkey in Europe, and in Servia, on the confines of Bosnia. It stands upon upon a small island formed by the Drino, 20 miles E of Sarino.

DRINO, one of the navigable rivers in Turkish Illyricum, belonging to the Ottoman Porte.

DRINO, a sea-port of Turkey in Europe, on a bay of the Adriatic sea, and of the same name. It lies 58 miles S. E. of Ragusa. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 20, 12, E.

DRIO, a harbour on the W. side of the island of Paros, in the Archipelago and Turkey in Europe, where the Turkish vessels commonly ride at anchor.

DRIOS, straits lying betwixt Sumatra and the isle of Lingen, in the Indian ocean, in Asia, through which ships generally pass from Malacca to Batavia. The entrance into these straits is on the E. side of the Great Carimon.

DRISSEN, or DREYSEN, a town in the New Marck of Brandenburg, in Germany. It has a fortress, being a regular pentagon with ditches, which is reckoned impregnable, near the frontiers of Poland, at the junction of the Netze and Trage. On the Polish side it is covered by a large marsh; and its two rivers part at the entrance of the place, and afterwards inclose it.

DROGHEDA, or TREDAGH, a large old town, and the capital of Louth, a county in the province of Leinster, in Ireland. It has a market, fair, and good harbour, but of difficult entrance. The river Boyne divides it into two parts, which are joined again by a bridge over it. Here they carry on a good trade to the N. parts of England, and have great quantities of coals brought from Whitehaven, which they distribute over the country both by land and up the Boyne.

In 1649, Cromwell stormed and took it, when about 4000 men found in arms in it were put to the sword. It sends two members to the Irish parliament. It lies seven miles W. of the Irish channel, and 26 N. of Dublin.

DROGICZYN, a town of Podlachia, in Little Poland. It stands on the river Bug. Here is held both a provincial court and a diet of the states.

DROITWICH, a corporate bailiwick and borough of Worcestershire, famous before the Conquest for its salt-works, the salt of which is white, and made only from the summer to the winter solstice, and not all the year, lest they over-stock the market. It stands on the Salwarp, which river and the Stour have been made navigable by act of parliament. Here are four churches; and it sends two members to parliament. Its weekly market is held on Friday; the annual fairs are on Good Friday, October 28, and December 21. It lies six miles from Worcester, and 95 from London.

DROME, a considerable river of Dauphiny, in France. It rises in the valley of the same name, near the village of Bastie des Fonts. In its course receiving the little rivers Meyroce, Sure, Roane, Geroane, Veoure, and Besc, it falls at last into the Rhone.

DROMMORE, or DRUM-MOHRE, in Irish denoting the ridge or back of a great hill, is a market-town and see of a bishop, in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. Here are two alms-houses for clergymen's widows. The river Lagan divides the town, at the E. end of which is an old and spacious fortification, called Danish Mount. In and near this town are many linen-weavers, with turberries and marble in several places. The turnpike from Dublin to Belfast passes through this town: and it lies four miles from Moyrah.

DRONERO, a town of Italy, in Piemont, and in the marquisate of Saluces, seated at the foot of the Alps, on the river Macra, over which there is a bridge, of a prodigious height.

DRONNINGBORG, a bailiwick in the diocese of Aarhus and North Jutland, in Denmark. It contains 58 parishes, among which is Glenstrup, once a famous Benedictine abbey.

DRONFIELD, in Derbyshire, stands four miles W. of Bolsover, and 112 computed, 153 measured miles N. W. from London, among the mountains at the edge of the Peak; in so wholesome an air, that the natives commonly live to a very great age, and it is therefore so resorted to, that it abounds with gentry and fine buildings. Besides a charity-school, here is a free grammar-school, founded in 1567. Its market is on Thursday; and it has four yearly fairs, viz. January 10, April 14, July 15, and September 1.

DRONTHEIM, a town in the diocese of the same name, in Norway, on the river Nid, which issues from Tydal, a rising ground, and falls below into the lake Selbofee, and from thence to the N. it runs towards the town, which it surrounds almost entirely. Here the king of Norway formerly resided, and so did afterwards the archbishops, till this order of prelacy was abrogated upon the reformation. Here were anciently ten churches and five convents; but at present there are only two churches and an hospital-church. The cathedral, a magnificent structure, built of beautiful marble, was burnt as far as the choir in 1530: which part is still standing, and is large enough for a church. Here the diocesan amtmann and bishop reside; the town has a magistrate and bailie, a fine Latin school, a mission-seminary, an orphan-house, a work-house, an infirmary, and an hospital.

Here is carried on a considerable trade in timber, fish, coarse goods, and copper from the neighbouring works of Meldal, and Roraa. Its strength consists in the mountain-fort of Christianstein; the fortifications.

tifications on the land-side, and Munkholm. It has suffered considerably by three fires, being all timber houses. In the year 1685, king Christian V. staid at Drontheim for some days in the month of June, and supped at midnight without any candle-light, which the clear summer-nights render unnecessary here. On the E. side of the town is the suburb of Bakkelandet, with a church of its own, and not far from thence is Ladegaard, with another. The above-mentioned fort Munkholm stands on a rock in the harbour, defending both it and the town towards the sea. Here state-prisoners are usually confined. It lies 261 miles N. E. of Bergen. Lat. 63, 16, N. Long. 10, 55, E.

DRONTHEIM, or TRONTHEIM, the largest government in all Norway. It lies along the coast of the N. Sea, being about 500 miles in length, from S. to N. It has the North Sea on the W. the government of Wardhus on the N. that of Bergen on the S. and on the E. it is separated from Sweden and part of Russia by a long ridge of mountains, called Kolen; so that it extends from lat. 61, to 69, N. but its greatest breadth from E. to W. is not above 120 miles, and in many places much less. The country is mountainous, woody, cold, and barren. The towns in it are few, and those inconsiderable. The country is, but very thinly peopled, and not cultivated except along the sea-coast, and that only within 25, or 30 miles from it.

The diocese of Drontheim consists of three large provinces or bailiwicks; namely, Drontheim Proper, Nordland, and Finmark. To Drontheim also belongs the little district of Romsdal and Nordmor, but with a particular amtman; also the bailiwicks of Fosen, Oerkedalen, Guledal, Strinden (in which is the town of Drontheim,) Stordalen, Inderoen, and Nummedal. The jurisdiction of Nordland comprehends the bailiwicks of Helgeland, Salten, Sennien, Tromsoen, and Lofoden. Finmark includes West and East Finmark. Several Danish missions have been established in these parts, with good success among the Lapps or Laplanders.

DRUMBOTE, a town in the county of Monaghan, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It lies 10 miles W. of Dundalk.

DRUMLANERIG, a market-town of Nithdale, one of the subdivisions of the shire of Dumfries, in the S. of Scotland.

DRURYD, a river in Merionethshire, which runs into the Cunwell below Festimog.

DRUSSENHEIM, a market-town of Alsace, and bailiwick of Offendorf, near the junction of the Motter with the Rhine. Lat. 48, 32, N. Long. 8, 18, E.

D R

DRUSES, a people of Syria, near the Holy Land, on the mountains Libanus and Antilibanus. They pretend they are descended from the French that went to conquer Jerusalem. They call themselves Christians, but they may as well be said to be Mahometans. However, they are warlike, inured to labour, are great enemies of the Turks, and have their particular princes, called emirs. Some say they are tributary to the grand seignior.

DRUSIANA FOSSA, or THE CANAL OF DRUSUS, was one cut by him to convey the waters of the Rhine into the Sala, now the Sale, and from thence through the lake Flevus into the ocean. It extended eight miles from the present village of Isefoort to the town of Doesburg, and was very convenient for conveying Roman troops by water to the countries of the Frisii and the Chauvi.

DRUSLLWYN, a village in Caermarthenshire, with two fairs, on July 1, and Oct. 5.

DRUWIN, on the ivory coast, Guinea. The coast from Cape Palm to Druwin bears E. and by N. and W. and by S. about 26 miles, all high and flat land.

DRYOPIS, mentioned in our article Doris, was a country situate in the neighbourhood of the mountains Oeta and Parnassus.

DRYPHIS, a mountain of Eubœa, whereon was a famous temple dedicated to Diana, there worshipped under the name of Dryphas.

DUARE, a town of Venetian Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyricum. It stands in the narrow pass of Rodoviglia, on the E. bank of the river Cetina, in the neighbourhood of Almissa, upon a very high mountain, and surrounded with old towers.

DUBIL, a village in Persia, near the coast of the Caspian Sea, which (according to the account given us by Crusins and Bruyman, the Holstein ambassadors in 1633,) had been so remarkably infamous for the debauchery of its inhabitants, that Sha Abaw Abbas extirpated them, and sent a new colony to the place.

DUBITZ, a frontier fortification of Croatia, beyond the Save, in Hungarian Illyria. It stands on the river Unna, and in the place lies a garrison of Croats.

DUBITZA, a town of Bosnia, in Turkish Illyria, defended with a rampart, and pallisadoes round it.

DUBLIN, a pretty town of Philadelphia county, belonging to Pennsylvania, 10 miles N. E. from Philadelphia, and the same distance S. W. of Bristol.

DUBLIN, by the Saxons called Duffin, by the Welch Dinas-dulin, and in the Irish language Ballacloigh; i. e. a town upon hurdles, on which the

the people think the city is founded, the ground being soft and quaggy. But the original words signify a walled town, particularly raised with stones.

It is the capital of Ireland, in magnitude and number of inhabitants the second city in the British dominions; much about the size of Stockholm, Copenhagen, Berlin, and Marseilles. It is built in the form of a square, about two miles and a half long, and nearly as much in breadth, and is supposed to contain 160,000 inhabitants. It is situated 270 miles N. W. of London, and 60 miles W. from Holyhead, in N. Wales, the usual station of the passage vessels between Great Britain and Ireland. Dublin stands about seven miles from the sea, at the bottom of a large and spacious bay, to which it gives name, upon the river Liffey, which divides it almost into two equal parts, and is banked in through the whole length of the city, on both sides, which form spacious quays, where vessels below the first bridge load and unload before the merchants doors and warehouses.

A stranger upon entering the bay of Dublin, which is about seven miles broad, and in stormy weather extremely dangerous, is agreeably surprised with the beautiful prospect on each side, and the distant view of Wicklow mountains; but Dublin, from its low situation, makes no great appearance. The increase of Dublin, within 20 years last past, is incredible, and it is generally supposed that 4000 houses have been added to the city and suburbs since the reign of queen Anne. This city in its appearance bears a near resemblance to London. The houses are of brick; the old streets are narrow and mean, but many of the new streets are more elegant and better planned than those of the metropolis of Great Britain. Sackville-street, which is sometimes called the Mall, is particularly noble. The houses are elegant, lofty, and uniformly built, and a gravel walk runs through the whole at an equal distance from the sides.

Near the exchange, on a little eminence is the castle, the residence of the lord-lieutenant, which consists of two large courts, called the upper and lower castle-yard; in the latter of which are the treasury, &c. Though there is little grandeur in the outward appearance of either, yet upon the whole, this castle is far superior to St. James's.

The river Liffey, though navigable for sea vessels as far as the custom-house, or centre of the city, is but small, when compared to the Thames at London. It runs for two miles almost in a straight line through the city. Over it are two handsome bridges, lately built of stone, in imitation of that at Westminster, and three others that have little to recommend them. Hitherto the centre of Dublin towards the custom-house, was crowded and inconvenient for commercial purposes, but of late, a new street has been opened, leading from Essex-bridge to the castle, where the lord lieutenant resides. A new exchange has lately been built upon the most magnificent plan, the first stone of which was laid by Lord Townshend, the then lord-lieutenant, in the centre of which is a statue of his present majesty George III. erected in 1779. Several other useful undertakings and embellishments are in agitation.

The barracks are pleasantly situated on an eminence near the river. They consist of four large courts, in which are generally quartered four battalions of foot, and one regiment of horse; from hence the castle and city guards are relieved daily. They are said to be the largest and completest building of the kind in Europe. A new square called Palatine-square, has lately been erected near it.

The linen-hall was erected at the public expence, and opened in the year 1728, for the reception of such linen cloths as were brought to Dublin for sale, for which there are convenient apartments. It is entirely under the direction of the trustees for the encouragement of the linen manufactory of Ireland, who are composed of the lord chancellor, the primate, the archbishop of Dublin, and the principal part of the nobility and gentry. This national institution is productive of great advantages, by preventing many frauds which otherwise would be committed in a capital branch of trade, by which many thousands are employed, and the kingdom greatly enriched.

Steven's-green is a most extensive square, being one mile in circumference. It is partly laid out in gravel-walks, like St. James's park, in the midst is a statue of George II. on horseback, with trees on each side, in which may be seen, in fine weather, a resort of as much beauty, gaiety, and elegant finery, as at any of the public places in England. Many of the houses round the Green are very stately, but a want of uniformity is observable throughout the whole. Ample amends will be made for this defect by another spacious square near Steven's-green, called Merryon's-square. The houses being lofty, uniform, and carried up with stone as far as the first floor, give the whole an air of magnificence, not exceeded by any thing of the kind in Britain, if we except Bath.

The front of Trinity-college, extending above 300 feet, is built of Portland-stone in the finest taste. The house of lords is a beautiful room, and is ornamented with an equestrian statue of William III. The parliament-house was begun in 1729, and finished in 1739, at the expence of 40,000*l*. This superb pile is in general of the Ionic order, and is at this day justly accounted one of the foremost architectural beauties. The portico in particular, is, perhaps, without parallel; the internal parts have also many beauties, and the manner in which the building is lighted has been much admired. But one of the greatest and most laudable undertakings that this age can boast of, is the building of a stone wall about the breadth of a moderate street, a porportionable height, and three miles in length, to confine the channel of the bay, and to shelter vessels in stormy weather.

Before I quit this subject it may be observed, that the public erections of this city, and all over the kingdom are the works of parliament, and executed at the national expence. They are numerous, they are substantial; and they comprehend whatever is great and striking in architecture.

The civil government of Dublin is by a lord mayor, &c. the same as in London. Every third year, the lord mayor and the 24 companies, by virtue of an old charter, are obliged to perambulate the city and its liberties, which they call riding the franchises. Upon this occasion the citizens vie with each other, in show and ostentation, which is sometimes productive of disagreeable consequences to many of their families. In Dublin are two large theatres, that are generally well filled, and which serve as a kind of nursery to those of London.

In this city are two cathedrals, 18 parish-churches, eight chapels, three churches for French, and one for Dutch Protestants, seven Presbyterian meeting-houses, one for Methodists, two for Quakers, and 16 Roman Catholic chapels. At Kilmainham is a royal hospital like that at Chelsea, for invalids; here is also a lying-in hospital, with gardens, built and laid out in the finest taste; and an hospital for lunatics, built by dean Swift, who himself died a lunatic; and sundry other hospitals for patients of every kind.

It has, however, been matter of surprise, that with all this spirit of national improvement, few or no good inns are to be met with in Ireland. In the capital, which may be classed among the second order of cities in Europe, there is not one inn that deserves that name. Lat. 53, 10. Long. 6, 32.

DUBLIN, a county of Ireland, 27 miles in length, and 17 in breadth; bounded on the E. by the Irish Sea, on the W. and N. W. by Kildare and East-Meath, and on the S. by Wicklow. It contains 21,304 houses, seven baronies, 87 parishes, four market-towns, and sends 10 members to parliament. It is but a small county, but the soil is very rich and fertile in corn and grass, and the chief place is the city of Dublin.

DUBTSCHES, one of the rivers which falls into the Jenissei, in Asiatic Russia. See JENISSEI.

DUCHESSE-COUNTY, in New-York, on the E. side of Hudson's-river, N. of Philipburg, and W. of Connecticut.

DUDERSTADT, a town of Eiffield and Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is subject to the elector of Mentz. It lies 40 miles N. E. of Cassel. Lat. 51, 41, N. Long. 10, 12, E.

DUDLEY, a famous ancient castle on the extremity of Staffordshire S. and on the confines of Worcestershire. It stands on a high mountain, and is a building of a vast extent, with trenches round it. Great part of it is in ruins, and the rest is converted into the seat of lord Ward. It has a prospect into five counties, and part of Wales, overtopping all the groves round it. In the hall of this castle is a table of one entire plank, which was 25 yards long, and one yard broad, before it was fitted here; but 7 yards and nine inches have been cut from it, in order to make another table. Near the castle lies the town of the same name, but in the county of Worcester; with a considerable market on Saturdays for provisions, and three fairs, on May 8, for cattle, wool, and cheese; on August 5, for cattle and lambs; and on October 2, for horses, cattle, wool, and cheese. The inhabitants have a great manufacture for nails and other iron-ware, and there are two churches, placed at each end of the longest street. It is 10 miles W. of Birmingham, and 120 N. W. of London. Long. 2, 5, W. Lat. 52, 30, N.

DUFFRIN, a village of Glamorganshire, in S. Wales; which has one fair on August 10.

DUISBURG, a populous town in the duchy of Cleve, and circle of Westphalia. It stands on the Roer, which river falls a little lower into the Rhine, and on the confines of the duchy of Berg. It is subject to Brandenburg, and has several churches and convents of both sexes. In the forest, near the extremity of which it lies, they catch wild horses that are small, but never tire. It lies 12 miles N. of Dusseldorp. Lat. 51, 24, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

DUITZ, or DEUTZ, a village of Newburg, opposite to the city of Cologne. It is subject to this ecclesiastical elector, and principally inhabited by Jews, who fatten swine for sale to the Christians, and are not admitted into Cologne without a guard, nor suffered to lie a night there, but pay a florin of gold for every hour they stay. Here is a Benedictine convent, and parochial church.

DUKE-COUNTY, New-England. See MARTHA'S VINEYARD.

DUKE'S-COUNTY, in the province of New-York, bounded on the S. by the county of Westchester, on the E. by the Connecticut-line, on the W. by Hudson's-river, and N. by the county of Albany. The S. part is occupied by iron-works, being being mountainous; the rest is a good upland country, well watered. There are in it two mean villages, Poghkeeping, and the French-kill. The inhabitants on the banks of the river are Dutch; but those more easterly, Englishmen. A few years have raised it from 12 families, to that pitch, that by the lifts it will furnish at present 3500 fighting men.

DULAS, Isle of Anglesey, N. Wales, is a place much frequented on account of the corn and butter trade, and upon all the coast they make fern-ashes, which are sold to soap-boilers, glass-houses, melting-houses, and refiners. Near it there is a red okery earth, fit for painting, and veins of lead-ore, are lately discovered.

DULAS, a river in Anglesey, which runs into the Irish Sea opposite Mica-island; another river of that name is in Montgomery, which runs into the Severn below Llanidlos; and in the same county is another of that name which runs into the Severn at Newtown; and a third in that county of the same name, that runs into the Towy below Macherlet. There is a river of the same name in Radnorshire, which runs into the Ithon near Llanbadern.

DULASHE, a river in Caermarthenshire, which runs into the Towy at Drufon-castle.

DULCIGNO. See DOLCIGNO.

DULISHE, a river in Glamorganshire, which runs into the Neath, at Llanylied.

DULTABAD. See DOLTABAD.

DULVERTON, in Somersetshire, on the borders of Devonshire, stands, with a bridge, on the Dunsbrook, near its fall into the Ex, 169 miles from London, 24 from Barnstaple, and 27 from Bridgewater, is a place of good accommodation, and has a market on Saturday, and fairs on July 10, and November 8. There are some lead-mines near this town, but the ore is hard and barren, and the lead that comes from it is harder than that of the Mendip-hills.

DULWICH, a pleasant village in Surrey, and confines of Kent, in the neighbourhood of London. To it is a great resort of the middling class in the summer-season, for drinking the waters of Dulwich, or Sidenham-wells; &c. Here is a handsome college or hospital, founded by one Mr. Aleyn, a player, for a master, warden, four fellows, six poor men, and as many poor women, with a school for 12 poor boys. The medicinal waters here are sent to town, and particularly to St. Bartholemew's hospital, Smithfield. From rising grounds near the Green Man in Dulwich, is a beautiful prospect of the neighbouring country all round.

DUMBARTON, DUMBRITTON, or LENEX, (shire of,) in the S. of Scotland, and belonging to the W. Highlands. It lies above Glasgow, on the other side of the river Clyde, and runs out a long way N. among a chain of hills. It is bounded on the S. by the river and frith of Clyde, on the N. W. by Argylshire, on the W. it has Lochlung, and a water of the same name that falls into it; on the N. are the Grampian-hills, which begin here, and run on to Aberdeen; and on the E. Monteith and Stirlingshire, being divided from the latter by the water of Blane. Its dimensions are variously given; Templeman makes its length 41 miles, and breadth 27. Its bounds indeed, were formerly larger than at present, especially on the E. side, and contains only 12 parishes. This is a very mountains country; but the lower parts towards the E. are very fruitful, and a fit soil for corn; the hills yield good pasture for cattle, great and small. The river Levin, from which Livinia, the Latin name for Lenox is derived, falls into the Clyde out of Loch-lomond, a lake spreading itself under the mountains, 24 miles in length, and eight in breadth, though in the narrowest part not above two. It has an exuberance of fish, among which is a peculiar sort, called poans or pollacks, of the eel-kind, and very much prized. Its banks are lined with cottages of fishermen.

This lake contains about 30 islands, in three of which are churches, some of the others are uninhabited. The principal isle called Inchmurin, is fruitful in corn abounding in pasture and deer; the most remarkable among the others, are Nachastal, Inchadvanam, Inchonnaugam, Inchnolaig, and Rowglaf. The Roman wall beginning at Abercorn, runs through Dumbartonshire, and ends at Kilpatrick on the Clyde.

DUMBARTON, a royal burgh, and the capital of the last-mentioned shire of the same name; it belongs to the district of burghs with Renfrew, Glasgow, and Ruglen, which send a member alternately to the British parliament. It stands at the junction of the river Levin with the Clyde. It was once a considerable place for trade; but now much decayed.

About half a mile from the town is a castle, standing on a craggy rock, two-peaked, and steep every way, except towards the Clyde, with a high watch-tower, besides many lower and strong towers. It is one of the important passes between the Low Country and the Highlands. Here resides a governor, with a constant garrison of invalids. It lies 20 miles N. W. of Glasgow. The town is the seat of a presbytery, containing 17 parishes.

DUMBLAIN, a pleasant little town of Monteith, one of the subdivisions of Perthshire, in the middle partition of Scotland, on the river Allan; in its neighbourhood a warm skirmish, commonly called the Sheriff-moor, was fought between his majesty's forces commanded by the duke of Argyl, and those of the Chevalier, only a militia of Scottish High and Low-landers, under the earl of Mar, in 1715, when a wing of each side was victorious, and the other defeated. But though the latter kept the field of battle all night, and the Chevalier himself landed in a few days after, his stay among them was but short, and his party gradually disappeared. It lies seven miles N. of Stirling.

DUMESNESS, or DOMESNESS, a noted promontory in the district of Pilten, and duchy of Courland: it stretches northward into the gulph of Livonia, and from this head-land, for the space of four miles runs a sand-bank into the sea, the other half of which lies concealed under water; and besides, to the E. is an unfathomable smooth abyfs near it. But that such ships as sail to Livonia may avoid this dangerous shelve, at the extremity of the land, just by the church of Domesnes, and opposite to the sand-bank, are two quadrangular light-houses erected, facing each other; one of which is twelve fathoms high, and the other eight and a half. In both these a strong fire is kept up, from the first of August to the first of January, and that constantly, from the evening twilight to day-break. If sailors see only one fire, they are exactly at the end of the shelve, and out of danger; but as soon as both light-houses appear, then they begin to be in danger. These light-houses are six miles from the estate of Dondangen, the proprietor of which has an annual allowance of 2500 rix-dollars common money from the city of Riga, for defraying this expence; and besides, the lord of the manor has a privilege of trading with the Dutch. A very large forest in the neighbourhood supplies it with plenty of fire-wood; and the strand of Dondangen is about 11 miles in length.

DUMFERMLING, an ancient place in the W. extremity of Fifeshire, and S. of Scotland, though formerly of note, is now much declined. It is a royal burgh, and in the same district with that of Inverkeithing, Stirling, Culrofs, and Queensferry, which alternately send a member to the British parliament. Here are the ruins of a stately monastery and royal palace, where king James VI. resided before his accession to the crown, of England, and his children were born. It is the seat of a presbytery, containing 20 parishes. Part of the monastery serves still for a church, being very large and handsome. Here are the tombs of king Malcolm Canmore, his queen St. Margaret, and their eldest son prince Edward, being only plain and coarse marble stones. The principal support of the town is a manufacture of diaper, and the finer sort of linen, which employ many hands both in this and the neighbouring towns. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Edinburgh.

DUMFRIES, the capital of Nithsdale, and the shire of its own name, in the S. of Scotland. It lies on the Nid or Nith; and though two leagues from the sea, yet the tide flowing up, small ships many come close to the quay; and about four miles below, the largest vessels may ride in safety. It has large streets, with good houses, and abounds with merchants. Dumfries is one of the district of royal burghs with Kirkcudbright, Lochmaben, Annan, and Sanquhar, which by turns, send a member to every new British parliament. In the church here, Robert Bruce run John Cuming lord Badenock through the body, for betraying his secrets to king Edward I. of England, and easily obtained a pardon from the Pope for it. This town has two acts of parliament successively for the two pennies Scots duty, as it is called; and for tonnage, &c. in order to pay their debts, enlarge their harbour, and for other public buildings. Over the river is a stone-bridge of 13 large arches; and in the middle is a gate, the boundary of the shire of Dumfries and Galloway. Here is a pretty good castle. It is the seat of a presbytery, containing 18 parishes, and of a provincial synod, composed of four presbyteries, which have under their inspection 54 parishes. In the neighbourhood is Lincluden, formerly a very magnificent collegiate church; from which it is said there was a subterraneous passage to the abbey, six miles off. It lies eight miles N. of the Solway-frith. Lat. 54, 50, N. Long. 3, 19, W.

DUMFRIES, a county of Scotland, comprehending Annandale, Wachopdale, and Nithsdale, extends in length from W. to E. about 50 miles, and is about 34 in breadth, where broadest. It is bounded on the W. by Galloway and Kyle; on the E. by Solway frith, and the marches between Scotland and England; on the N. by part of Clydesdale, Tweeddale, and Teviotdale; and on the S. by the Irish sea. The country is rough and mountainous, not so well adapted for corn as for pasture; and, of consequence, innumerable flocks of sheep and herds of black cattle are bred in this county, and fattened for exportation to England. The face of this country is bare and brown, almost destitute of wood, and very deficient in fuel; yet the valleys being watered and fertilized by abundance of streams, produce good corn. In the division called Nithsdale are mines of lead, and, as it is said, of silver and gold also; but the two last-mentioned are not worked. The capital is of the same name.

DUMFRIES, a town in Stafford county, Virginia, on a branch of Patowmack river, 12 miles S. W. of Colchester, and 30 N. from Falmouth.

DUN, a lough, or inland lake in the shire of Air, and S. division of Scotland. From it issues a river or water, over which is a bridge of one very large arch.

DUN.

D U

DUN, a considerable river of England, which rising in the mountains of Derbyshire, on the E. it runs to Doncaster, and from thence into the sea at the Humber, being made navigable in several places.

DUN, a pevoité district of French Barrois, and government of Metz, in France. It was formerly included in the country of Dormois, or Doulmois, and belonged to crook-backed duke Godfrey; which he made a present of in 1066, to the bishopric of Verdun; but in the succeeding century it was sold to the counts of Bar, and afterwards annexed to the duchy of this latter name.

DUN LE ROI, a town of Upper Berry, in France, one of the royal demesnes, which must not be alienated from the crown. Here is a salt-magazine, a collegiate church, and likewise a parochial one. It lies on the river Auron, and on the confines of the Bourbonnois. It was formerly one of the most considerable towns of Aquitain. It lies 20 miles S. of Bourges. Lat. 46, 51, N. Long. 2, 50, E.

DUNA, a river in the duchies of Livonia and Esthonia, now a province belonging to Russia. It abounds in excellent fish, as salmon, &c.

DUNA, DZWINA, (Kubo) a river of Poland, which taking its rise from Russia, runs through Lithuania; and after it has divided Courland from Livonia, and watered Riga, it falls near Dunamund into the gulph of Livonia, in the Baltic. This seems to be the same with the foregoing, though that in Livonia is called Duna, and that in Muscovy, Dwina.

DUNABURG, a strong castle and place near it, in the capital territory of the same name, in Semigallia, and duchy of Courland. It stands on the N. side of the river Duna, and has three senators. It lies 28 miles N. of Breslaw.

DUNAMUNDE, a fine fortress in the general government of Riga, in Livonia, now belonging to Russia. It lies about two miles from the city of Riga, on the outlet of the Duna, where all vessels that sail from the Baltic up that river are obliged to pay toll. It has been often taken: the last time the Swedes took it in 1701, the fine train of Saxon artillery fell into their hands, the Saxons having mastered the place the preceding year; but in 1710 the Russians took it. This was formerly a convent of Cistercian monks.

DUNAVETZ, or DUNAJETZ, a river of Upper Hungary, which rising in the northern eminences of the Carpathian mountains, runs into the Vistula.

DUNBAR, an ancient town and famous castle, the latter now ruined, in East Lothian, or constabulary of Haddington, in the South division of Scotland. It is one of the district of royal burghs, which, with Jedburgh, Haddington, North Berwick, and Lauder, alternately send a member to the British parliament. It is a handsome, well-built town, at the mouth of the frith of Forth, and on the S. side, towards the German ocean. It is a considerable port, but its entrance is difficult, by reason of steep rocks; for the cutting through which, carrying the pier to the beacon rock, and other public purposes, the town had a two-penny Scots act upon ale. Here they cure herrings as at Yarmouth in Norfolk, being a larger and fatter kind than those of the latter place. To the S. W. of the town is Dunhill moor, where, in 1650, a battle was fought between Oliver Cromwell and General Lesly, commander of the Scottish army; when the former, with not above 8000 men, defeated the other side, killing 6000, and taking 10,000 prisoners, a late traveller says.

D U

The passage into the harbour of Dunbar is very narrow, between two rocks: one of them is the E. side of the harbour; the other is a promontory, stretching out about 100 yards to the north, and is about 20 yards wide, having the sea on each side of it when the tide is in. This head is a most extraordinary natural curiosity; it is of a red stone, which is not a lime-stone, but appears rather like a very hard free-stone. It looks on both sides like the Giants Causeway in Ireland: the stones on the west side are from a foot to two feet over, on the E. side they are larger, from two feet to four. I observed the pillars from three to eight sides; but only one or two of the first and last: they may be said to be in joints, but are strongly cemented together by a red and white sparry substance, which is formed in laminæ round the pillars, and between the joints, two or three inches in thickness. The interstices between the large pillars, which are but few, are filled with small pillars, without joints. The pillars consist of horizontal laminæ; the joints are not concave and convex when separated, but uneven and irregular; they lie sloping from E. to W. on the W. side, towards the end, the pillars become very large and confused, as I saw them to the E. of the Giants Causeway, and in the isle of Mull; except that these are divided by such a sparry substance into a great number of small figures, which seem to go down through them. There are spots and veins of a whitish stone in the pillars. There is no sign of any thing of this kind in any of the rocks near, that I could observe or hear of. It lies 20 miles E. of Edinburgh. DUNBARTON. See DUMBARTON.

DUNBRITTON. See DUMBARTON. So the frith

frith of Clyde is otherwise called, and in the western highlands of Scotland. Between this and the frith of Fouth Severus's or Adrian's wall extended itself, which is commonly called Graham's Dyke; having been fortified with redoubts; and of it several remains are still to be seen. It was raised as a rampart against the incursions of the Picts and Highlanders.

DUNCANNON, a small town in the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland; with a good fort upon Waterford haven. From hence to the mouth of the river, a narrow neck of land shoots out, on which stands a high tower, called Hook Tower, besides a light-house for the direction of sailors into the mouth of the river. It lies eight miles E. of Waterford.

DUNDALK, a town in the county of Louth, and province of Leinster in Ireland.

It has an open bay of the same name, but its harbour is inconsiderable.

It has the privilege of holding a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. It lies 20 miles N. of Drogheda.

DUNDEE, i. e. a hill on the Tay, anciently Alectum, or Taodunum, is the most considerable town in the shire of Forfar, or Angus, in the middle division of Scotland. It is pretty large, pleasantly situated, and populous, and one of the gayest in all Scotland, hence called Bonny Dundee. It stands at the foot of a hill, on the N. side of the river Tay, and near its mouth; and is one of the royal burghs, which, with Perth, St. Andrew's, Cowpar, and Forfar, send by turns one member to the British parliament. It is the seat of a presbytery, containing 17 parishes, has a harbour and very flourishing trade, both foreign and inland: for they ship off vast quantities of corn to London, the Baltic, and Amsterdam; and they have considerable linen manufactures, herring-fishery, &c.

The great church here, formerly collegiate, is an exact cross, with a fine steeple. Into the harbour are three entrances: it is capacious, but not for vessels of great burthen; and there is safe riding in the river itself, though the port at the town is only fit for small vessels.

General Monk stormed the town, though it was defended by 11,000 soldiers, besides inhabitants, and putting all he found in arms to the sword, carried off a vast booty. It lies 16 miles N. W. of St. Andrew's. Lat. 56, 26, N. Long. 2, 48, W.

DUNDERY, a village of Somersetshire, five miles S. W. of Bristol, with a fair on September 12.

DUNDRUM, in Down county, Ulster province, in Ireland, 11 miles from Rathfryland, on a bay of the same name. Here are remains of a castle, which when in repair was a good guard to this pass in the time of the great rebellion. It stands on a rock commanding a view of the whole bay and harbour within it, of a great part of Lough on one side, and the high mountains of Dundrum and Mourne on the other. The bay is spacious, but one of the most dangerous for shipping in Ireland, there being but a tide-harbour for small vessels in the middle of the bay. It is about three leagues long, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ broad. This harbour and the lough of Strangford form the peninsula of Lough, sometimes called Marle-ille, from the abundance of its marle.

DUNEBURG, a town of Livonian Woywodship, which is a palatinate of the great duchy of Lithuania, where the diet of the states and provincial courts are held; from the latter of which there lies no appeal but to the assessorial court. It stands on the N. shore of the Duna, and 80 miles N. E. of Riga. Lat. 59, 42, N. Long. 26, 17, W.

DUNGANNON, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tirone, and province of Ulster, 11 miles N. of Armagh. Long. 7, 5, W. Lat. 54, 28, N.

DUNGARVON, a town in the county of Waterford, and province of Munster, in Ireland, on a bay of its own name, with a strong castle and commodious road for shipping. It lies 24 miles N. W. of Waterford. Lat. 51, 57, N. Long. 7, 55, W.

DUNGENESS, a noted head-land of Kent. It lies seven miles S. of Romney. Dungeness is a low beachy point, steep close to, on which stands a light-house, called the Ness Light. Lat. 51, N. Long. 51, E.

DUNGSBY-HEAD, DUNSBY-HEAD, or DUNCAN'S-BAY-HEAD by some, a promontary, which is the utmost N. E. point of Caithness, in Scotland, and most northerly land of the main island of Great Britain. It opens into Pentland or Pictland frith. At this point to the N. as at Buchaness to the E. begins that bay called the Murray-frith, up to Inverness. From Dunsby-head sailors take their distances and keep their anchorings, in their going farther to the northward.

DUNHAVAND, DUNBAVAND, or DAMAVAND, is a remarkable mountain in Persia.

DUNHILL-BATTLE. See DUNBAR.

DUNHOLM, in Nottinghamshire, six miles from Tuxford: fair on August 12.

DUNKELD, in the native language Dunkeillon, i. e. the hazel-hill, from the eminence near it being covered with woods of that timber. It stands at the foot of the Grampian mountains, on the N. side of the Tay. It was formerly the capital of Caledonia, and the see of a bishop. It is the only market-market-town in this part of the Highlands; and the seat of a presbytery, containing 20 parishes. The ruins of its cathedral are still visible, the prebendaries of which were Culdees or Black-monks, and it was dedicated to St. Columba. In this neighbourhood the duke of Athol has a genteel modern house, with handsome gardens, on the opposite side of the Tay, where its banks are pretty high. And the public is not a little indebted to his grace, as he has very much repaired the roads for a considerable way upon his own lands, and set up mile-stones, and that joining to the military road made by general Wade, which goes to Inverness.

DUNKIRK, i.e. a church on a down or sandy hill, in French Dunkerque, a town of French Flanders, on the Colne, which here falls into the English channel. It is the most easterly harbour on that side the French dominions, next Great Britain, and is a bailiwick subject to the provincial council of Artois. The principal buildings are, the town-house, in which is a public library; the exchange, opposite the town-house; the barracks, the armoury, the rope-walk, the magazine for naval stores, the park of artillery, and the royal hospitals; besides which are the church of St. Eloy, with 15 chapels round it; the church and college lately belonging to the Jesuits, four convents, and five nunneries. It was taken from the Spaniards by the French in 1558, but they re-took it soon after. Its inhabitants greatly annoyed the Dutch from 1591 to 1636.

In 1646 and 1658 it was taken by the French; and in the latter year it was ceded to the English, in consideration of their services in assisting them against Spain. But in 1662 king Charles II. sold it to the French for 218,750 l. upon which Marydyke, and the other neighbouring villages erected by the English, came into the possession of Lewis XIV. who, upon this, very considerably improved and enlarged its fortifications, adding sluicas, canals, and dams to the harbour, which before was in very good condition: so that in succeeding wars it became a station for privateers and small frigates, which did considerable damage to the English, who, for that reason, at the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, insisted on the demolition of the harbour and its fortifications; and afterwards at the Hague in 1717, and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. It has now about 12,000 inhabitants; but before the destruction of its fortifications it had upwards of 26,000. It was lately made a free port. In 1690 it was attacked by the Dutch and English forces, but without success. The road is one of the best and securest in Europe; but the harbour will not admit a ship of war of the first rate. The road lies at the distance of two miles and a half from the town, about three from the new harbour of Marydyke, and is sheltered by the Braeck, a sand-bank, extending parallel to the shore, two leagues E. and W. Upon this bank the sea is not above four feet deep at low water, and therefore ships cannot get over it, but at the time of the flood: but there are two channels, one at each end of the road. Behind the Braeck, to the eastward of Dunkirk, you may anchor, sheltered from a N. W. N. and N. E. wind, in two fathoms at low water, but it shoals more to the shore. In the road you may anchor to the E. of Dunkirk, almost close to the jetties, in nine or ten fathoms, very good holding ground, being clay mixed with sand; and to the W. in six, seven, or eight fathoms water. It lies 15 miles from Nieuport, 11 from Gravelines, and 22 E. of Calais, 55 of Dover, and 26 S. W. of Ostend. Lat. 51, 7, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

DUNMORE, a market-town of Essex. It lies 12 miles from Chelmsford, and 38 from London, DUNMOW, a market-town of Essex, in which the manufacture of baize flourishes; but is particularly remarkable since Henry III.'s time, for the custom of giving a fitch or gammon of bacon to any married couple who will swear, on two peaked stones in the church-yard, that for a year and a day after marriage they never repented in the least of it, nor differed all that time; and this appears upon record to have been actually claimed, and delivered to several. Its weekly market is on Saturday; and fairs on May 6 and November 8. It lies 38 miles from London.

DUNNEGAL, or DONEGAL, capital of the county of the same name, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, at the mouth of the Eask, upon the bay of Dunnegal; its harbour is capacious, but has dangerous rocks and shelves at its entrance. It has the privilege of holding a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. It lies 12 miles N. of Ballishannon, and 30 from Cape Telling.

DUNNET-HEAD, a promontory in the shire of Caithness and N. of Scotland, which stretches out into the Pentland frith. It is about a mile broad, and seven in compass, with several loughs, and pasture for cattle, but no inhabitants. Here are dug good mill-stones, and it is thought to contain lead.

DUNNINGTON, in Holland division, Lincolnshire, seven miles from Boston, 23 S. E. of Lincoln, and 99 from London. It is noted for a large sale of hemp and hempsed, it having a good market on Saturdays, and a fair on May 15. It has a port for barges, by which goods are conveyed to and from Boston and the Washes. Long. 5, W. Lat. 52, 55.

DUNOIS, a county and subdivision of Lower Orleans, in the government of the latter name, in France. It has an exuberance of all sorts of grain. It is bounded on the E. by Orleans, on the S. by Blaisois, on the W. by Vendomois; and on the N. by the Lesser Perche. It is about 10 leagues in length, and seven or eight in breadth. This country is watered by the Loire, Convoys, Egre, and Hierre.

DUNS, a large market-town, and burgh of barony, in the Merse or Berwickshire, and S. of Scotland. It is populous, and has the best trade in the county, with a handsome castle. Its market, which is held on Wednesday, is the best in all the kingdom, for corn, sheep, horses, and cows; and has an annual fair on Trinity-Monday. It lies 14 miles W. of Berwick.

Here is the seat of a presbytery, containing 11 parishes.

DUNSBAY-HEAD. See DUNSBAY.

DUNSBROOK, a river in Devonshire, which runs into the Ex below Eiverton.

DUNSMORE, a river in Staffordshire, which runs into the Churnet at Leek.

DUNSTABLE, a town in the province of New Hampshire, in New England, on the banks of the river Merimack, where it has a large precinct.

DUNSTABLE, a populous market-town, in Bedfordshire, on a chalky hill, its name importing an eminence, and at the entrance of the Chiltern-hills; on the old Watling-street, where the Icknild-street crossed it. Here are four streets answering to the four cardinal points; and for want of springs, unless they dig very deep for them, each has a public pond of rain water, which are never dry. In 1214, Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, held a council here; and several of the people called Lollards were executed in this place, in the reigns of Henry V. and VII. Its weekly market is held on Wednesday, and its annual fairs are Ash-Wednesday, May 22, August 12, and November 12. It lies 16 miles from the town of Bedford, and 34 from London.

DUNSTABURG-CASTLE, on the coast of Northumberland, between the Doquet and the Fearne isles, on a very fruitful spot. It is remarkable for a sort of spar, called Dunstaburg diamonds, like those of St. Vincent's rock near Bristol, known under the name of Bristol-stones.

DUNSTEIN, or DUNCHSTEIN, a place in Cologne, in Germany, and near Andernach, much resorted to for its mineral waters, which are often drank with wine.

DUNSTAFFAGE-CASTLE, or St. STREHEN'S-HILL, the principal place in Lorn, a subdivision of Argyleshire, in the Middle Division of Scotland. It was formerly a royal seat and burying-place, where many of the kings of Scotland are interred.

D U

DUNSTER, in Somersetshire, two miles from Minehead, 20 miles from Taunton, and 164 from London, had a castle. The town stands on a low ground, every where shut in with hills, except towards the Severn sea. The castle, now in ruins, consisted of two wings, and three towers; and has a fine prospect of a vale of two miles bounded by the Severn. Here are about 400 houses, and its only manufacture is kerseys. The church, which is large, has a handsome tower, built in the reign of Henry VII. It is called a borough in old writings, and once sent members to parliament. The market is on Friday, fair on Whit-Monday.

DUNWICH, on the coast of Suffolk, was once the see of a bishop; till the Conqueror translated it to Thetford; and from thence it was afterwards translated to Norwich. The Romans resided here whilst they were in England. Its numerous churches have been long swallowed up by the sea, and only one is now standing, with a few houses; yet it is governed by two bailiffs, and sends two members to parliament. At this place they have a considerable fishery. It lies 42 miles from Bury, and 95 from London. Its market is on Saturday; fair on July 25.

DUPLIN-COUNTY, in the district of Wilmington, in N. Carolina, has the N. E. branch of Cape Fear river for its boundary on the N. and E. and Pelham county S.

DUQUELA, a province of Africa, in the kingdom of Morocco, about 75 miles in length, and 60 in breadth. It abounds in corn and sheep; Azamor is the capital town.

DU-QUESNE. See PITTSBURG.

DURANCE, a river of Dauphiny, in France; it issues from Mount Genevre, one among the Alps, whence it directs its course W. along the confines of Dauphiny and Provence; then running S. by Sisteron, afterwards W. through Provence, is navigable at Cavaillon; and has a very rapid current, often causing great inundations, and at last falls into the Rhone a little below Avignon.

DURANGO, a small but well-inhabited town of Biscay Proper, in Spain. It lies in a deep valley between high hills, &c. upon a small river which surrounds it on the land-side. The inhabitants manufacture great quantities of sword-blades, hilts, &c. It lies 20 miles E. of Bilbao. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 2, 36, W.

DURANGO, an episcopal city of Chiametlan, and Guadalupe, in Mexico, in N. America, at the confluence of several rivers, which renders the place commodious for trade. It lies 10 leagues to the N. W. of Nombre de Dios.

DURANS DORF, or DORLS DORF, a town of Upper Hungary, in the Hither Circle of the Theiss, which looks more like a village. It has spacious corn-fields, and plenty of wood belonging to it.

DURAS

DURAS, a town of France, in Guienne, with the title of a duchy. Long. 0, 15. E. Lat. 45, 42. N.

DURAVEL, a town of France, in Quercy, seated on the river Lot, on the confines of Agenois. Long. 1, 5. E. Lat. 45, 40. N.

DURAZZO, the ancient Epidamus, which denoting the treacherous and debauched character of the inhabitants, the Romans changed it to Dyrrhacium. The Turks call it Drazzi. It was a noted sea-port of Albania, in European Turkey; but is now a mean place, upon a peninsula in the E. part of the gulph of Venice. This was the retreat of Pompey, when he fled before Cæsar from Brundisium in Italy; and also the place where Cicero resided during his exile. It has been subject to the Turks ever since the time of Bajazet II. It lies 25 miles S. of Drino. Lat. 41 58. N. Long. 25, 1. E.

DURBUY, a small city of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the Ourte. Here is a convent of recolects, who teach polite literature; another of penitent nuns, and an hospital. It lies 30 miles S. of Liege. Lat. 41, 50. N. Long. 5, 28. E.

DURCKEIM, a town of Germany, in the Palatinate, 12 miles N. E. of Neustadt. Long. 7, 55. E. Lat. 49, 26. E.

DUREN, a town in the duchy of Juliers, in Germany, 10 miles S. of the city of Juliers, and subject to the elector Palatine. Lat. 50, 51. N. Long. 6, 20. E.

DURESTAL, or DORTAL, a town of Anjou, in France, on the Loire, over which is a bridge with a castle, and the houses mostly free-stone, and slated. Its principal trade is tanned leather; and it has two parishes. It lies three leagues below La Fleche, and twice as many from Angers.

DURHAM, Durham, a pleasant, healthy, large city. It is 256 miles from London, and 65 from York, stands on a hill almost surrounded with the river Were, and is about 70 years older than the Conquest, an episcopal see being erected here in 995. It is said to have been first incorporated by Richard I. and was anciently governed by bailiffs appointed by the bishops, afterwards by an alderman and 12 burgeses, but queen Elizabeth gave it a mayor, aldermen, and common-council-men; and by a charter granted in 1684, it is governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, 12 common-council-men, recorder, town-clerk, &c. who can hold courts-leet and baron within the city, under the stile of the bishop, who is a temporal prince, being also earl of Sadberg in this county, which he holds by barony, and is sheriff paramount, and appoints his deputy, who makes up his audit to the bishop, without accounting, as other sheriffs, to the exchequer. The magistrates keep a pye-powder court also at the fairs, which are March 3, Whitfun-Tuesday, and September 25, and pay about 20l. a year toll to the bishop or his lessee. This is reputed one of the best bishoprics in England, and the livings in the bishop's gift the richest, there being 13 from 300 to 800l. a year each.

King Henry VIII. established the present endowment for a deanery here, with 12 prebendaries, 12 minor-cansons, &c. The cathedral, which is a magnificent pile, was, before the Reformation, called St. Mary's and Cuthbert's, the body of which last was translated hither, and gave rise to the foundation of its cathedral; but in king Henry VIII.'s statutes, it is stiled Ecclesia Cathedralis Christi & Beatæ Mariæ. The decorations of it for the administration of the divine offices, are said to be richer than those of any other cathedral in England. It was remarked not very long ago, that the rich old vestments which the clergy here wore before the Reformation, were still worn by the reverend residents on Sundays and holidays; and that though many dignified and learned protestant clergy live here, there are a great numbers of Roman Catholics in and about the city. Besides the cathedral here are six parish-churches, three in the city, and three in the suburbs.

On the S. of the cathedral is the college, with the prebendaries houses, and on the N. side is the college-school. Here was a castle on the N. E. side of the river Were, afterwards the bishop's palace, built by William the Conqueror, between two stone bridges over the Were, in the heart of the city, the outer gate of which is now the county-jail. In St. Mary's chapel in the cathedral, is the tomb of the venerable Bede, whose virtues are represented in a parchment scroll over it; and in this church are kept some old records of Scotland, whose kings have been great benefactors to it, the cathedral having been rebuilt by David king of Scots. Here is the shire-hall, where the assizes and sessions are held for the county, and near it a good library, built by bishop Cosin, and the exchequer, built by bishop Nevil, in which are the offices belonging to the county palatine court.

Here is an hospital also built and endowed by bishop Cosin, and at each end a school founded by bishop Langley, but new built by bishop Cosin. The city, which is fortified with walls, though upon uneven ground, is about one mile long, and as much in breadth, and has three manors, viz. the bishop's manor, the dean and chapter's manor, and another called Gilligate. The remains of the Roman way, called Ikenild street, are still visible near this city. The market here is on Saturday. The first time that this city or county sent members to parliament was in 1673; those for the city are chosen by the corporation, citizens and freemen, who at a poll in 1710, were above 1000.

DURHAM, (the bishopric of,) received its name from its chief town, called by the Saxons Deorham, or Dunholm, to express its situation on a hill surrounded by a river. On the conversion of the kingdom of the Northumbrians, of which this was a part, this county was bestowed on St. Cuthbert, bishop of Lindisfarne, and his successors for ever. This grant was ratified both by the Danes and Normans, with the addition of several privileges, particularly that of being a county palatine, enjoying the same prerogatives within, as the king did without its bounds; with respect to forfeitures, &c. Thus it was a kind of royalty subordinate to the crown. It is bounded on the N. by the river Tyne, which parts it from Northumberland; on the E. by the German ocean; on the S. by the Tees, which divides it from Yorkshire; and on the W. by Westmoreland and Cumberland. It extends 39 miles in length, and 35 in breadth. It is in the diocese of its own name, and contains one city and seven market-towns, 59 vicarages, 113 parishes, near 230 villages, about 15,980 houses, and 96,900 inhabitants; but sends only four members to parliament, namely, two for the county and two for the city of Durham. The air of this county is wholesome, and though very sharp in the western parts, is milder towards the sea, whose warm vapours mitigate the severity of the winter seasons. The soil is very different, the western side being mountainous and barren, while the eastern and southern parts nearly resemble the S. of England, and consist of beautiful meadows, rich pastures, woods, and corn fields. The inhabitants have their industry rewarded by the immense quantities of coals, lead, and iron found in the bowels of the earth.

DURHAM, a town in Newhaven county, Connecticut, 9 miles S. W. from Middletown, and the same distance E. from Hadham, and eight N. E. from Wallingford.

DURLACH, or BADEN-DURLACH, (Lower marquisate of,) in Suabia, in Germany. It lies contiguous to the marquisate of Baden on the N. E. has the duchy of Wirtemberg on the E. the Rhine, which separates it from Alsace, on the W. and part of the Lower Palatinate, and the bishopric of Spire, on the N. subject to the marquis of its own name.

DURLACH, the capital of the last-mentioned marquisate of the same name. It is a pretty large town on the Pfintz, at the foot of a mountain, at the top of which is a strong tower. Here is a magnificent palace, a good library, and cabinet of curiosities; also a gymnasium with professors. The streets are fair, and houses uniform. It lies 20 miles N. E. of the city of Baden. Lat. 49. 20. N. Long. 8. 20. E.

DURLSDORF, or DURANS DORF, a town in the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. Round it are spacious fields, and it has plenty of wood.

DUROBRIVIS, an ancient Roman station, now Caster, a village near Stamford, in Lincolnshire, where the Ermine street seems to be continued, and crossed in the neighbouring river. Dronfield retains something of the old name.

DURSEYS, anciently Bea Infula, an island on the Irish coast, near Bantry bay, very difficult to land on, as there is but one landing-place, and this must be in a dead calm. It is about three miles long, and very rough and coarse.

DURSLEY, a cloathing and market town of Gloucestershire. It is governed by a bailiff. Formerly, a man of Dursley was a proverbial denomination for a sharper: but the present inhabitants are said to be quite the reverse. Here is a handsome church and spire. Its weekly market is kept on Thursday; and annual fairs May 6, and December 4, for cattle and pedlary. It lies 18 miles from Gloucester, and 97 from London.

DURTAL. See DURESTAL.

DUSSELDORP, or rather DUSSELDORFF, the elector palatine's capital, in the duchy of Berg, and circle of Westphalia. It is a large, well-built town, in a fine plain, on the little river Dussel, which here falls into the Rhine, and consequently it stands on the E. bank of the latter river. It is defended by a citadel, with bastions and cavaliers upon them. Here is a stately Gothic palace, with fine paintings and other ornaments. Dusseldorp has three weekly markets, for corn imported from the Netherlands, and sold into several parts of Germany. Here all religions are tolerated, but the Catholics are only admitted to civil employments. In the town is a collegiate church, besides another church, and a convent lately belonging to the Jesuits, with a college and seminary for poor scholars. The Rhine runs here so rapidly, that they have been obliged to break its force by several great works. It lies 24 miles N. of Cologne. Lat. 51. 20. N. Long. 6. 21. E.

DUTCH BRABANT and FLANDERS. See BRABANT and FLANDERS.

DUTLINGEN, a town of Suabia, in Germany, and belonging to the duke of Wirtemberg. It lies on the E. side of the Black forest, near the source of the Danube, over which river it has a bridge, also a castle on a hill without the town. It lies five miles W. of Mulheim.

DWARF-HILL, in the Orkneys of Scotland. See Hoy.

DWINA,

D Y

DWINA, i. e. double, as consisting of the united streams of the Suchona and Jug, near Ustiaga, a large river in European Russia; and in Latin called Duina. It runs from S. to N. through the province of its own name. Near Archangel it parts into two branches, and afterwards discharges itself into the White or Frozen sea. The Dwina or Duna, in Poland, must not be confounded with this river, though it rises also in Russia, which running N. W. through Lithuania, and dividing Livonia from Courland, falls into the Baltic at Dunamunde fort, below Riga.

DWINA, one of the circles included in the government of Archangel-gorod, in European Russia. It is bounded by the White sea on the N. and by Rubeninski on the S. the capital of which is Archangel.

DUXBURY, a maritime town in Plymouth colony and county, Massachusetts bay, on a river that runs into Plymouth bay, from whence it is two miles distant, and about 30 from Boston.

DUYVELAND. See DYVELAND.

DYKRICH, the capital of a provostship, under which are 26 villages, in Luxemburg, and the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Soure. Its most considerable church is St. Lubent. Here is a chapter, a fine convent, and hospital. And at this place are kept four annual fairs. It lies nine miles from Echternach.

DYLE, a river of the Austrian Netherlands, has its source in Brabant, where it runs N. by Louvain, and afterwards receiving the Demer, and washing Mechlin, empties itself at Ripplemunde into the Schelde.

DYRAFIORDUR, or THIJNGEYRE, a trading place of Iceland, in Norway, both for fish and flesh.

DYSERT, a royal burgh of Fifeshire, in the S. of Scotland. It is included in the district with Burntisland, Kirkaldy, and Kinghorn, which send a member alternately to the British parliament. It lies on the N. shore of the frith of Forth, and 15 miles N. of Edinburgh.

DYVELAND, or DUYVELAND, an island in Zealand; so called from the multitude of doves bred here. It lies S. E. of that of Schowen, from which a narrow channel divides it, and is even joined to it by a bank or dyke. Most of it belongs to the city of Zirick-Zee, having no towns but villages upon it.

DZWINA, the same with DENA, a river of Poland.

EAGLES-LAKE, otherwise called AROL NOR, a collection of waters in Tartary, in Asia.

EARITH, a town of Huntingdonshire, furnished with two or three pretty good inns. It has no market, but three fairs, on May 4, July 25, and November 1.

EARN, or EARN LOUGH, one of the three considerable inland lakes in the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland. In the native language it denotes the lake of that kingdom, from its being the principal collection of fresh water in Ireland, and which in Latin is called

E A

Erne. It is 28 miles long, and issues, by a pretty large river, into Dunnegal bay by the N. W. of the province, below Ballyshannon. See ERNE.

EASINGWOLD, or ESSINGWOLD, a market-town in the North Riding of Yorkshire. Its annual fairs are on July 5, and September 25.

EAST, (The Children of the). By the children of the East, spoken of in Judg. vi. 3, 33, may be denoted the Ammonites and Moabites, as lying to the E. of the land of Israel, if not some of the Ishmaelites, and others that inhabited the parts of Arabia lying eastward in respect of the Israelites.

It is evident, that by the children or people of the east, in Gen. xxix. 1, are understood the inhabitants of Mesopotamia; but these seem to lie too far off to be concerned in these incursions into the land of Israel. And therefore, since we read Gen. xxv. 6, that Abraham sent away the sons of his concubines (particularly the sons of Keturah, one whereof was Midian, the father of the Midianites) eastward, unto the east country, it may be probably inferred, that by Children of the East, in the history of Gideon, are denoted the descendants of the other sons of Keturah, and of the brothers of Midian, who had settled in the E. parts adjoining to Midian.

EAST COUNTRY in Gen. xxv. 6, means the parts of Arabia lying eastward.

EAST, (the land of people of the) in Gen. xxix. means Karan in Mesopotamia.

EASBURY, a village in Kent; with a fair on October 2.

EASTBORN, a town of Sussex, whose market is discontinued; but has a fair on October 10. It is seated near the sea, and is chiefly noted for the plenty of birds hereabout, called Wheat-ears. It is 25 miles E. S. E. of Lewes, and 60 S. S. E. of London. Long. 0, 15, E. Lat. 50, 46, N.

EAST-BRENT, a village in Somersetshire, four miles N. of Huntspil; with a fair on August 26.

EAST-CHESTER, a town in the county of West-Chester, in the province of New-York. See WEST-CHESTER, (county of.)

EAST-DEAN, a village in Sussex, five miles N. of Chichester, with a fair on October 28.

EASTER ISLAND, an island in the South Sea, lying in N. lat. 27, 5, W. long. 109, 46. It is thought to have been first discovered in 1686 by one Davis, an Englishman, who called it Davis's Land. It was next visited by commodore Roggeveen, a Dutchman, in 1722, who gave it the name of Easter Island, and published many fabulous accounts concerning the country and its inhabitants. It was also visited by a Spanish ship in 1770, the captain of which gave it the name of St. Carlos. The only authentic accounts of this island, however, which have yet appeared, are those published by captain Cook and Mr. Forster, who visited it in the month of March 1774. According to these accounts, the island is about 10 or 12 leagues in circumference, and of a triangular figure; its greatest length from N. W. to S. E. is about four leagues, and its greatest breadth two. The hills are so high, that they may be seen at the distance of 15 or 16 leagues. The N. and E. points of the island are of a considerable height; between them, on the S. E. side, the shore forms an open bay, in which captain Cook thinks the Dutch anchored in 1722. He himself anchored on the W. side of the island, three miles northward from the S. point. This, he says, is a good road with easterly winds; but a dangerous one when the wind blows from the contrary quarter, as the other on the S. E. side must be with easterly winds: so that there is no good accommodation to be had for shipping round the whole island.

The island itself is extremely barren, and bears evident marks not only of a volcanic origin, but of having been not very long ago entirely ruined by an eruption. As they approached the S. point, Mr. Forster informs us, that they observed the shore to rise perpendicularly. It consisted of broken rocks, whose cavernous appearance, and black or ferruginous colour, seemed to indicate that they had been thrown up by subterraneous fire. Two detached rocks lie about a quarter of a mile off this point: one of them is singular on account of its shape, and represents a huge column or obelisk; and both these rocks were inhabited by multitudes of sea-fowls. On landing and walking into the country, they found the ground covered with rocks and stones of all sizes, which appeared to have been exposed to a great fire, where they seemed to have acquired a black colour and porous texture. Two or three shrivelled species of grasses grew among these stones, and in some measure softened the desolate appearance of the country. The farther they advanced, the more ruinous the face of the country seemed to be. The roads were intolerably rugged, and filled with heaps of volcanic stones, among which the Europeans could not make their way but with the greatest difficulty; but the natives leaped from one stone to another with surprising agility and ease. As they went northward along the island, they found the ground still of the same nature; till at last they met with a large rock of black melted lava, which seemed to contain some iron, and on which was neither soil nor grass, nor any mark of vegetation. Notwithstanding this general barrenness, however, there are several large tracts covered with cultivated soil, which produces potatoes of a gold yellow colour, as sweet as carrots, plantains, and sugar-canes. The soil is a dry, hard clay; and the inhabitants use the grass which grows between the stones in other parts of the island as a manure, and for preserving their vegetables when young from the heat of the sun.

The most remarkable curiosity belonging to this island is, a number of Colossian statues; of which, however, very few remain entire. These statues are placed only on the sea-coast. On the E. side of the island were seen the ruins of three platforms of stone-work, on each of which had stood four of these large statues; but they were all fallen down from two of them, and one from the third: they were broken or defaced by the fall. Mr. Weles measured one that had fallen, which was 15 feet in length, and six broad over the shoulders: each statue had on its head a large cylindric stone of a red colour, wrought perfectly round. Other were found that measured near 27 feet, and upwards of eight feet over the shoulders; and a still larger one was seen standing, the shade of which was sufficient to shelter all the party, consisting of near 30 persons, from the rays of the sun. The workmanship is rude, but not bad, nor are the features of the face ill formed; the ears are long, according to the distortion practised in the country, and the bodies have hardly any thing of a human figure about them. How these islanders, wholly unacquainted with any mechanical power, could raise such stupendous figures, and afterwards place the large cylindric stones upon their heads, is truly wonderful! The most probable conjecture seems to be, that the stone is factitious; and that each figure was gradually erected, by forming a temporary platform round it, and raising it as the work advanced: but they are at any rate very strong proofs of the ingenuity and perseverance of the islanders in the age when they were built, as well as that the ancestors of the present race had seen better days than their descendants enjoy. The water of this island is in general brackish, there being only one well that is perfectly fresh, which is at the E. end of the island; and whenever the natives repair to it to slake their thirst, they wash themselves all over; and if there is a large company, the first leaps into the middle of the hole, drinks and washes himself without ceremony; after which another takes his place, and so on in succession. This custom was much disrelished by their new friends, who stood greatly in need of this valuable article, and did not wish to have it contaminated by such ablutions.

The people are of a middle size. In general, they are rather thin; go entirely naked; and have punctures on their bodies, a custom common to all the inhabitants of the South-sea islands. Their greatest singularity is the size of their ears, the lobe of which is stretched out so that it almost rests on their shoulder; and is pierced with a very large hole, capable of admitting four or five fingers with ease. The chief ornaments for their ears are the white down of feathers and rings which they wear in the inside of the hole, made of the leaf of the sugar-cane, which is very elastic, and for this purpose is rolled up like a watch-spring. Some were seen clothed in the same cloth used in the island of Otaheite, tinged of a bright orange-colour; and these our voyagers supposed to be chiefs. Their colour is a chesnut-brown; their hair black, curling, and remarkably strong; and that on the head as well as the face is cut short. The women are small, and slender limbed: they have punctures on the face, resembling the patches sometimes used by European ladies. They paint their faces all over with a reddish brown ruddle, and above this they lay a fine orange-colour: the whole is then variegated with streaks of white. But the most surprising circumstance of all with regard to these people is, the apparent scarcity of women among them. The nicest calculation that could be made, never brought the number of inhabitants in this island to above 700, and of these the females bore no proportion in number to the males. Either they have but few females, or else their women were restrained from appearing during the stay of the ship; notwithstanding, the men shewed no signs of a jealous disposition, or the women any scruples of appearing in public: in fact, they seemed to be neither reserved nor chaste; and the large pointed cap which they wore, gave them the appearance of professed wantons: but as all the women, who were seen very liberal of their favours, it is more than probable, that all the married and modest ones had concealed themselves from their impetuous visitants, in some inscrutable parts of the island; and what farther strengthens this supposition is, that heaps of stones were seen piled up into little hillocks, which had one steep perpendicular side, where a hole went under ground. The space within, says Mr. Forster, could be but small; and yet it is probable that these cavities served, together with their miserable huts, to give shelter to the people at night; and they may communicate with natural caverns, which are very common in the lava currents of volcanic countries. The few women that appeared were the most lascivious of their sex that perhaps have been ever noticed in any country, and shame seemed to be entirely unknown to them.

EASTHAM, a town in Barnstable county, Plymouth colony, New England. It is situated in the middle of the peninsula, on the W. coast that forms Cape-Cod bay, and is but five miles from Chatham on the E. coast at Sandy Point.

EAST-ISLEY, a town in Berkshire, seated between two hills, among fruitful corn-fields, and excellent downs for feeding sheep. This place is not contemptible; has a market every Wednesday in the summer, chiefly for sheep; and one fair on August 6; is 17 miles S. of Oxford, and 51, W. of London. Long. 1, 10, W. Lat. 51, 37, N.

EAST-MAIN, the county of Labrador is so called, as that of New Wales is denominated the West Main.

EASTMEON, a village in Hampshire, five miles S. E. of Petersfield, with a fair, on Sept. 19.

EASTON, a village in Bristol county, Plymouth colony, New England, near the head of Rainham-river, 6 miles N. W. of Rainham, and 12 W. of Bridgewater.

EASTON, a town in Northampton county, Pennsylvania, opposite Philipsburg, in New Jersey, 10 miles N. E. of Northampton, and is situated on the Delawar river.

EASTONNESS, the most easterly head-land of Suffolk, and N. point or boundary of Southwold-bay.

EASTRY, in Kent, S. W. of Sandwich, fair on Oct. 2.

EATON-COLLEGE, in Buckinghamshire, 22 miles from London, separated from Windsor by a bridge over the Thames, was founded by Henry VI. for the maintenance of a provost and seven fellows, one of whom is vice-provost, and for the instruction of 70 king's scholars, (as those are called who are on the foundation) who, when fit, are elected, on the first Tuesday in August, to King's college, Cambridge, where they are provided for by scholarships and fellowships; but they are not removed till vacancies fall in the college, and then they are called according to seniority. The school is divided into upper and lower, and each into three classes. There is a master to each school, and 4 assistants to each master, there being seldom less than 300 scholars here, besides those on the foundation, who board at the masters houses, or elsewhere within the college-bounds.

In the great court is a fine statue, put up to the honour of the founder, by a late provost, Dr. Godolphin, dean of St. Paul's. The revenue of this college is about 5000*l.* a year. Here is a noble library, enriched by the late lord chief-justice Reeves, who chiefly resided at this place, with the fine collection of books left him by Richard Topham, esq. keeper of the records in the tower; and with another collection before that, left by Dr. Waddington, bishop of Chester, valued at 2000*l.* and it has a fair on Ash-wednesday.

EAUSE, in Latin, Elusa, a small new town in the territory of Eusan, in Armagnac and Gascony, in France. It stands on the river Gelise, close by the site of the old town of the same name, which was long the capital of Novempopulania; from this place the Elusati took their name. This antique place, called still a city, is almost decayed. It lies 20 miles S. W. of Crondom. Lat. 43, 52, N. Long. 0, 12, W.

EBBE'S, or EBBA'S-HEAD, (St.) vulgarly St. Tabbe's-Head, a noted promontory of Berwickshire, in the S. of Scotland. It has its name from

Ebba, the famous abbess of Coldingham, who was canonized, as having been burnt with all her nuns in their abbey by the savage Danes; they having cut off their noses and upper lips, lest they should fall a sacrifice to their brutal lust. On the point of this head-land was formerly a strong castle, long since demolished.

EBELSTOT, or EBELTOFT, in Latin, Pomagrium, a small town of North Jutland, in Denmark, on the bay of Ebeltosteric in the Catagat, which has a good harbour for ships of a middling burthen, for which reason the inhabitants carry on some trade. It lies on the bailiwick of Kalloe in Mols-herred. Not far from it lies the famous promontory of Hellenes, or Helgenas, i. e. the head-land of the Saints. It lies about 18 miles from Aarhus towards the N. W.

EBENEZER, a town of Georgia, about five miles from Abercorn, and up the river Savannah. It is a healthy place, where the Saltburgers are settled, with two ministers, who are a sober industrious people, that raise not only corn, and other productions, sufficient for their own subsistence, but sell great quantities to the inhabitants of Savannah. They have large herds of cattle, and are in a very thriving condition. Ten miles from thence, on a river running into the Savannah, is Old Ebenezer, where, till lately was a cow-pen, and a great number of cattle for the use of the public, and for breeding. Lat. 32, 10. Long. 82, 20.

EBENHEIM, one of the nine imperial cities of Alsace, which Lewis XIV. seized, and which the house of Austria has since ceded to the crown of France, by the treaty of Munster, in 1648.

EBERBACH, a town in Germany, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, seated on the river Necker, a mile and a half from Masbach, remarkable for its wine.

EBERENBERG, a town and strong castle of the Palatine electorate, in Germany, at the confluence of the Nahe and Alzzy. It lies eight miles S. of Creutznach. Lat. 49, 36, N. Long. 7, 17, E.

EBERHARD, a bourg in the Upper District of the isle of Schutt, and Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies in a plain, is ancient, and surrounded with ditches.

EBERSDORFF, a town in the circle of Austria, in Germany. It lies upon the Danube, 10 miles E. of Vienna. Lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 16, 30, E.

EBERSHEIM, a town of Lower Alsace, with an abbey. It lies between two arms of the river Ill.

Of the same name is a large village belonging to the cathedral of Strasburg.

EBERSTEIN, a town of Suabia, in Germany. It lies eight miles S. of Baden. Lat. 38, 5, N. Long. 8, 20, E.

EBER-

EBERSTEIN, a town of Alsace, and Upper Circle, of the Rhine, in Germany. It lies eight miles S. W. of Strasburg. Lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 8, 39, E.

EBODIA, or EVODIA, supposed by some to be the isle of Alderney, on the Norman coast.

EBORACUM, the Roman name of the city of York, through which passed three military ways. It was not only a colony, but the residence of the emperors and principal generals of that nation. See YORK.

EBREUIL, a town of France, in Auvergne, with a rich Benedictine abbey. It is seated on the river Seigle, eight miles from Riom, and 12 from Clermont. Long. 5, 5, E. Lat. 46, 5, N.

EBRO, in Latin, Iberus, a river of Spain, which rising in Mount Santillana, in the N. W. parts of Old Castile, on the borders of Asturias, from two springs; the principal of which has given its name to the village of Fuentibro, is the spring of Ebro.

After a considerable course, it runs from N. W. to S. E. quite across Aragon, washing its capital, Saragossa, and dividing the province into almost two equal parts; into it empty themselves the little rivers following; namely, on the N. side the rapid Cinca, or Cinga, the Callego, anciently Gallicus, the Isuela and the lesser streams of Aragon, Riguelo, Guerva, Rio de Aguas, Rio Martin, and Guadaloupe; but on the S. side then it receives Xalon (Salo) the Xiloca, and the smaller rivers Guadalayier and Alhambra; so that above 30 small rivers and brooks join it in its course, and it begins to be navigable near Tudela, but does not continue so farther than Tortosa; and besides, the navigation is rendered dangerous, by reason of many rocky parts. It runs S. W. through a small part of Catalonia, and at last discharges itself with great rapidity into the Mediterranean sea, at its mouth forming the little isles of Alfacqs. Its water is very good, both for drinking and washing; and for that reason is carried a pretty way off in vessels. From this river Spain was anciently called Iberia; the Celts, a nation of Gaul, who sent colonies thither, had the name of Celtiberians, and the country itself that of Celtiberia.

ECBATANA, a celebrated city of Persia, where the monarchs of Asia anciently resided in summer. It is supposed by some to be the modern Tauris; but there is not a single trace of its ancient stately palaces to be seen now, nor even their ruins to be found.

ECKBATANA, a town in Syria, is remarkable for the extraordinary death of Cambyses, king of Persia, there in the year of the world 3784, of the flood 2477, before Christ 522. This Cambyses, son of Cyrus, is the Abasuerus of our Bible.

ECCISO WERBENI, a place of Macedonia, in European Turkey, famous for mineral waters.

ECCLESHALL, a market-town of Staffordshire, near the river Sow. It is noted for pedlary wate, and has a charity-school for 20 poor boys to read and write; and for as many girls, who are clad with the cloth made of the yarn they spin. Its weekly market is on Friday, and four annual fairs, on Midlent Thursday, Holy Thursday, August 5, and the first Friday in November. It lies four miles from Stone, and 142 from London.

ECCLESTON, in Lancashire, on the Darwent, whose market is discontinued as well as the fairs. It is 24 miles S. of Lancaster, and 205 N. N. W. of London. By the late inland navigation, it has communication with the rivers Mersey, Dee, Ribble, Ouse, Trent, Darwent, Severn, Humber, Thames, Avon, &c. which navigation, including its windings, extend above 500 miles, in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, York, Lancaster, Westmoreland, Chester, Stafford, Warwick, Leicester, Oxford, Worcester, &c.

ECHALENS, a town in the canton of Berne, in Switzerland, where is but one church, and both religions have ministers for the performance of divine service alternately, each having a distinct pulpit.

ECHAUFOUR, a town of France, in Normandy, seated on a rivulet that falls into the Rille, between Aigle and Seez.

ECHED, (Great,) a fortress in the Farther Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary, which, by reason of its situation amidst swampy places and morasses, was impregnable: but in 1701 was dismantled, together with Little Eched.

ECHELLES, (Les,) a town of Savoy Proper, in Upper Italy, on the river Guier Le Vif, near which is a broad paved road, made by duke Charles Emanuel II. and at the end of it a good way cut through the hard inaccessible rocks, in the mountains, as appears from an inscription upon a monument on the left hand. This road is also called the Great Royal Way of La Crotte, from the village of this name.

ECHINADES. The Echinades were five small islands on the coast of Acarnania, over against the mouth of the river Achelous, from which the farthest distant is but fifteen furlongs, and the nearest only 5. They were thought to have been formed by the mud which this river has carried into the sea; whence arose the fable of their having been once sea-nymphs, but afterward by the god Achelous changed into islands. Some writers tell us that they were called Echinades, from the Greek word Echinos (a sea-urchin,) because that part of Ionia abounded with sea-hogs. They are now known by the name of the Cursolieres.

ECHTERNACH, or ECHTER, anciently Andethauna, a town of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the Sour, where the rivulet Our joins it. Here is a considerable Benedictine abbey, the abbot of which is lord of the town and its provostship. Here also is a parochial church, an hospital, and nunnery of St. Clara. The provostship includes Echternach, and 33 villages. It lies 12 miles from Treves on the W. and 20 N. E. of Luxemburg city. Lat. 50, 5, N. Long. 6, 30, E.

ECIJA, (city of,) a small place of Andalusia, in Spain, and subdivision of Seville, on the Xenil, was formerly more considerable than it is at present. In ancient times it was called Ashtigis, or Astyr; and afterwards a Roman colony, under the denomination of Augusta Firma, was sent thither. The circumjacent country is extremely fruitful: and its pastures feed large flocks of sheep, the wool of which is of considerable advantage to the inhabitants. Between this town and Ossuna, are morasses and pits, which the Spaniards call Lagunas. It lies 30 miles S. W. of Cordova. Lat. 37, 31, N. Long. 5, 15, W.

ECKEREN, a small place of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands. In 1703, an obstinate battle was fought near it between the French and Dutch, when the latter proved victorious. It lies six miles N. of Antwerp, and seven E. of Lillo. Lat. 51, 32, N. Long. 4, 21, E.

ECKENFOHRDE, or ECKELNFOHRDE, a town of Sleswic, in Denmark. Latterly it has been well-inhabited and flourishing, being almost entirely surrounded with water; and has an excellent harbour, which is both capacious and sufficiently deep. Formerly here was a pretty large staple; but its navigation is at present declining. The streets are broad, and planted with rows of trees. It has the privilege of using the Sleswic law, and has often suffered very much by fire. It lies six miles from Kiel to the N.

ECLUSE, a town of Artois, in the French Netherlands. It lies on the Cogneul, 15 miles E. of Arras. Lat. 50, 25, N. Long. 3, 10, E.

ECOUIS, a town of Normandy, in France. It stands in the heart of arable lands. Here is a weekly market on Friday, in which vast quantities of corn are vended; and has a collegiate church and an hospital. It lies seven leagues from Rouen, and 17 from Paris, being in the road between these two cities.

ECYA. See ECIJA.

EDAM, a town of N. Holland, and the W. coast of the Zuyder-zee. It has a pretty good harbour; the principal trade here consists in building of ships, and making of excellent cheese. It lies 14 miles N. E. of Amsterdam. Lat. 52, 30, N. Long. 4, 40, E.

EDAR. In Gen. xxxv. 1. we read that Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edar. By this tower of Edar here, some understand the field near Bethlehem, where those shepherds were keeping their flocks, to whom the angel appeared, and gave information of the birth of our Saviour. And among others, one reason that inclines them to understand it is, because the word Eder or Edar, does in Hebrew denote a flock: whence the same which is here rendered the tower of Edar, is in Micah iv. 8. rendered the tower of the flock. But from this last very text, others suppose that by the tower of Edar, is to be understood some place near Jerusalem; as the tower of Edar is here spoken of by the prophet, as being the stronghold of the daughter of Sion.

EDEM, a river which rises in Westmoreland, on the confines of Yorkshire, and running N. by Appleby and Carlisle, falls into the Solway-frith, seven miles W. of that city.

EDEN, Ptolemy's Ituna, a considerable river of Westmoreland, in the N. of England. It rises out of Morvil-hill or Wildbore-fell, on the confines of Yorkshire, after which, running through a fine valley, it washes Kirbysteven, Appleby, and the city of Carlisle in Cumberland, below which, about eight miles to the W. it empties itself into the Solway frith. Its course is very long, has the accession of several streams and rivulets by the way, and at Carlisle is a considerable body of water, but seems little used for navigation. It is famous for trouts and salmon.

Of the same name is a river near Cowpar of Fife, in Scotland.

EDEN, (garden of,) or the earthly paradise, a delightful spot in Syria, near Damascus. Others place it in the S. part of Diarbeker, or Mesopotamia.

EDENBURG. See OEDENBURG in Hungary; and EDINBURG, the capital of Scotland.

EDENTON, a town in the county of Chown, and district of Edenton, in N. Carolina, and formerly the capital of the whole province. It is situated at the bottom of a bay of the same name, in Albemarle-Sound.

EDESSA, anciently ÆGÆA, a town of Macedonia, in European Turkey, on the river Vistriza, or Erigonius. It was anciently the capital of the kingdom of Macedon, the royal residence and burying-place till king Philip's time.

EDGAR, a town in the island of Martha's Vineyard, New England, near the E. extremity of the island, about 14 miles from Barnstable county, on the continent.

EDGE COTT, in Northamptonshire, near Banbury and the valley of Danesmoor, which last is noted in history for two great battles in it, one between the Danes and Saxons, and the other between the Lancastrians and the adherents of Edward ward IV. There are three little hills about it, forming a kind of triangle, where the battle was fought.

EDGE-CUMBE-COUNTY, in the district of Halifax, N. Carolina, is bounded on the S. and W. by the river Tarr, which gives it communication with several counties in the province, and runs into Pamlico-sound.

EDGE-CUMBE, (Mount,) a fine seat and headland on the Cornish side of the river Tamer, but reckoned in Devonshire, near Saltaish and Ram-head, a noted sea-mark. It has a charming prospect of the winding harbour below it. This place was much admired by king Charles II. and has several block-houses near it to defend the harbour of Plymouth and the entrance of the dock-yards.

EDGE-HILL, a rising-ground at the W. end of the Vale of Red-Horse, in Warwickshire, on the declivity of which, between Radway and Kineton, was fought the first battle between the army of king Charles I. and that of the parliament, on Sunday, October 23, 1642, to the defeat of the former. It is steep on the N. side, and has a strong ancient entrenchment at top. It lies 8 miles N. W. of Banbury, in Oxfordshire, and 14 S. of Warwick town.

EDGWARE, or EDGEWORTH, a small market town of Middlesex, on the road to St. Alban's, the Roman Watling-street passing by. It lies twelve miles N. W. of London. Its weekly market is kept on Thursday. It consists but of one street, the E. end where the church is, being Edgware Proper, and the W. part called Whit-Church, with a charity-school in it.

EDINBURGH, a city of Mid-Lothian, in Scotland, and capital of the kingdom; situated in W. long. 3, N. lat. 56.

The origin of the name of Edinburgh, like that of most other cities, is obscure and uncertain. The name Edinburgh itself, however, seems to have been unknown in the time of the Romans. The most ancient title by which we find this city distinguished, is that of Castle Mynyd Agned; which in the British language, signifies "the fortrefs of the hill of St. Agnes." Afterwards it was named Castrum Puellarum, because the Pictish princesses were educated in the castle, (a necessary protection in those barbarous ages,) till they were married. The ages in which these names were given, cannot indeed now be exactly ascertained; but the town certainly cannot boast of very great antiquity, since, as Mr. Whittaker informs us, the celebrated king Arthur fought a battle on the spot where it is situated, towards the end of the fifth century.

Edinburgh is situated upon a steep hill, rising from E. to W. and terminating in a high and inaccessible rock, upon which the castle stands. At the E. end or lower extremity of this hill, stands the abbey of Holyrood-house, or king's palace, distant from the castle upwards of a mile, and betwixt which, along the top of the ridge, and almost in a straight line, runs the High-street. On each side, and parallel to this ridge or hill, is another ridge of ground lower than that in the middle, and which does not extend so far to the E. than on the S. being intercepted by Salisbury rocks, and Arthur's seat, a hill of about 650 feet of perpendicular height; and that on the N. by the Calton-hill, considerably lower than Arthur's-seat; so that the situation of this city is most singular and romantic, the east or lower part of the town lying between two hills, and the west, or higher part rising up towards a third hill, little inferior in height to the highest of the other two, upon which, as has been observed, the castle is built, which overlooks the town.

The buildings of the town terminate at the distance of about 200 yards from the castle-gate, which space affords a most delightful as well as convenient and healthful walk to the inhabitants. The prospect from this spot is perhaps the finest any where to be met with, for extent, beauty, and variety.

In the valley or hollow betwixt the mid and south ridge, and nearly parallel to the High-street, is another street called the Cow-gate, and the town has now extended itself over most part of that south ridge also. Betwixt the mid and north ridge was a loch, which, till of very late, terminated the town on that side. From the High-street towards the loch on the N. and Cow-gate on the S. run narrow cross streets or lanes, called winds and closses, which grow steeper and steeper the farther W. or nearer the castle, so that, were it not for the closeness and great height of the buildings, this city, from its situation and plan, might naturally be expected to be the best aired, as well as the cleanliest, in Europe. The first, notwithstanding these disadvantages, it enjoys in an eminent degree, but we cannot compliment it upon the latter, notwithstanding every possible means has been used by the magistrates for that purpose.

The steepness of the ascent makes the access to the High-street from the N. and S. very difficult; and has no doubt greatly retarded the enlargement of this city. To remedy this inconvenience on the N. and with a view to extend the town on that quarter, a most elegant bridge has been thrown over the N. loch, which joins the N. ridge to the middle of the High-street, by so easy an ascent as one in 16; and in pursuance of the design, a plan of a new town to the N. was fixed upon, and has for several years past been carrying into execution with an elegance and taste that does honour to this country.

The most remarkable public buildings of Edinburgh are,

The castle, which stands on a high rock, is accessible only on the E. side. On all others it is very steep, and in some places perpendicular. It is about 300 feet high from its base; so that, before the invention of artillery, it might well have been deemed impregnable; though events shewed it was not. The palace of Holyrood house; three hospitals for educating and bringing up children; one for old people; and an orphan hospital, in which children are received from any part of the kingdom under seven years old. Besides these, there are three workhouses which maintain 900 people; an infirmary, a college of physicians, an university, a theatre, a register-office for the public records, a concert-hall, and an observatory. The places of worship are, the collegiate church of St. Giles, Trinity-college church, Old and New Grey friars, the Tron church; Lady Yester's, Canongate; St. Cuthbert's, a chapel of ease; Lady Glenorchy's; and the Earle church; all Presbyterian. The English chapel was begun in 1771. Besides these, there are several other places of worship, which are in ruins, or disused.

The number of inhabitants of the city of Edinburgh is somewhat uncertain, and has been very variously calculated. By a survey made in the year 1775, it appears that the number of families in the city, Canongate, and other suburbs, and the town of Leith, amounted to 13,806. The difficulty therefore is to fix the number of persons in a family. Dr. Price fixes this number at $4\frac{1}{2}$; Mr. Maitland, at $5\frac{1}{2}$; and Mr. Arnot, at 6; so that, according to this last gentleman, the whole number of inhabitants is 82,836; to which he thinks 1400 more may be added for those in the garrison, hospitals, &c.

There are in Edinburgh 14 incorporations capable of choosing their own deacons, viz. The royal college of surgeons; the corporations of goldsmiths, skimmers, furriers, hammermen, wrights and masons, tailors, bakers, butchers, shoemakers, weavers, waukers, bonnet-makers, and merchant-company.

The revenue of the city, arising partly from duties of different kinds, and partly from landed property, is estimated at about 10,000*l.* per annum. As Edinburgh is not properly a sea-port, it hath never been remarkable for trade. Its principal support arises from the supreme courts of justice, which are held there, and from the college. The exports and imports must all go and come by the town of Leith. See the article LEITH.

EDISTONE, a dangerous rock off Plymouth, which is covered at high water, but bare at ebb, where the ingenious Mr. Winstanley built a light-house in 1696, which, after standing many violent storms, was blown down by that dreadful one on the 27th of November, 1703, when Mr. Winstanley, and all that were with him in it, perished; but another was built in 1706, in its stead, by the corporation of Trinity house, by duties on all vessels, which was burnt down in 1755, but re-built in 1759, again burnt down in 1770, and the present one finished in 1774. It is 14 miles S. of Plymouth.

EDIWESTON, in Nottinghamshire, to the S. E. of Okeham, six miles from Mansfield; with a fair on October 28.

EDMUND's-BURY. See BURY St. EDMUND's.

EDOM, or IDUMÆA, part of the present Arabia Petræa, in Asia. It lies between the Levant and the Red sea, dividing Asia from Africa.

EDOM, (the land of.) This country was originally, as far as we know, inhabited by a people called Horites, or Horim, whether so named from one Hor or Hori, mentioned Gen. xxxvi. 22-30, as a name among them, is what we know no more than whether mount Hor was so denominated from him, as some think. We read of this mountain, on the coasts of Edom, as that on which Aaron died, Numb. xx. 22-28.

EDONI. The Edoni or Edones, possessed that country of ancient Thrace which lay between the Strymon and the famous city Philippi, and are mentioned by Herodotus, Thucydides, Pliny, &c. The Edoni were governed by kings, like the other Thracian nations.

EDONIA, a region of ancient Macedonia, lay N. W. from Eupora, Ossa, and Calitera, on the confines of which ran the Strymon.

EDREI, mentioned Deut. iii. 1, probably lay in the S. part of the kingdom of Bashan; and this is confirmed in that it is joined, ver. 10, with Salchah, which plainly lay there, as appears from 1. Chron. v. 11. For the S. part of the kingdom of Og was that which was next to the Gadites.

EDWARD, (fort of,) on the Hudson river, 34 miles N. from Albany; it was built in 1755 by the English. In the late American wars it was taken by general Burgoyne, on July 6, 1777.

EDWAY, a river in Radnorshire, which runs into the Wye at Aberedway.

EDWINSTON, a village in Nottinghamshire, six miles N. E. of Mansfield, with a fair on October 28.

EFFERDING, or EVERDING, a strongly-fortified town of Upper Austria, in Germany. It is defended by a castle within, and another without the walls. It lies 12 miles W. of Lurtz. Lat. 48, 0, N. Long. 13, 44, E.

EFFINGHAM, in Surrey, between West Horsley ley and the Cookhams, in the road from Leatherhead to Guildford. There is a tradition, that it was once a large place, and had 16 churches, though now a small village. Here is a fair on St. Lawrence's day.

EGA, a town of Portuguese Estramadura, with about 1100 inhabitants, and in its district is one parish.

Of the same name is one of three rivers that water Navarre, and empty themselves into the Ebro.

EGÆAN SEA, otherwise now called the ARCHIPELAGO, that part of the sea which lies between Greece and Asia Minor.

EGDEAN, a village in Suffex, with a fair on September 4.

EGER. See AGRIA.

EGESTA, or SEGESTA, stood at a small distance from mount Eryx, in Sicily, and according to ancient tradition was built by Æneas, when he was by a storm driven on the coast of Sicily. This city was taken by Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse, by whose cruel command all the inhabitants were put to the sword, and even the ancient name of the place changed into that of Dicæopolis, which it did not long retain.

EGG, one of the western islands of Scotland. It lies not far from Coll, is three miles long, and a mile and a half in breadth, and the whole of it pretty good, either for pasture or culture. On the S. end is a mountain, and at the top of it a high rock 150 paces in circuit, with a pool of fresh water in the middle of it. There is but one pass up to it. On the S. W. side is a cave that will hold several hundred persons, and in this island are several medicinal springs.

EGG-HARBOUR-INLETS, on the coast near New York, where the Americans received a severe loss in stores and shipping by the British troops, October 1778.

EGHAM, in Surry, on the Thames, opposite to Stains, three miles from Windsor, and 18 from London. It is divided into four tithings; and being a throughfare from London to the west, has some very good inns. Here is a noble charity-school, besides alms-houses, particularly one for five old women, who have each an orchard. Fair September 19.

EGLISHAW, a small city of Zurich, a canton of Swisserland, about 16 miles N. of Zurich city, on a steep hill, at the foot of which runs the Rhine, with a broad and deep channel, and over it is a wooden bridge, fortified with an old tower. The town and its neighbourhood are very liable to inundations: and this is looked upon as an important part.

EGLISHA, one of the Orkney isles in the N. of Scotland, three miles long, and two broad, being pleasant and fruitful, with a secure road, and a parish church.

EGLWISGACH, in Denbighshire; with four fairs, on February 14, May 11, August 24, and November 24.

EGLWISWREW, in Pembrokeshire; with two fairs, on Holy Thursday, and on the first Monday after November 22.

EGMONT-ISLE, one of the new discoveries in the South Sea, first visited by captain Wallis, in June 1767, where the natives supplied him with cocoa-nuts, scurvy-grafs, and excellent water. On this island the dead bodies of the natives are not buried, but left to decay above ground, under a kind of canopy. Its inhabitants did not exceed above 100. Lat. 19, 20, S. Long. 138, 30, W.

EGRA, or EGER, a town of Bohemia, on a river of its own name. It is the capital of its circle, at the foot of the mountains, inclosing Bohemia on the W. It has a double wall toward the river, and in other parts a triple one, with a strong castle. In March 1742, the French took the town; but in September 1743 they surrendered it to the Austrians. In the neighbourhood are mines of silver and copper, with a purgative spaw, famous for distempers in the eyes, ears, or other parts of the head. Here the channel of the river is broad and deep, bearing large vessels, and abounding in fish. It lies 79 miles W. of Prague. Lat. 50, 21, N. Long. 12, 30, E.

EGREMONT, in Cumberland, nine miles from Ravenglass, 10 S. of Cockermouth, 297 from London. It stands on the banks of a little river that falls into the sea near the promontory of St. Bees, and at a small distance from the sea, where it has a harbour for boats. It had a castle formerly, seated on a sharp-topt hill; was a borough before king Edward I.'s time, and sent two members to parliament; but lost that privilege; but has a market on Saturdays, and a yearly fair. It has two bridges over the river Broadwater. W. Long. 3, 15. Lat. 54, 26.

EGRIPOS, an island in the Archipelago. See NEGROPONT.

EGUIRA, a country on the Rio de Cobre, on the Gold Coast of Guinea. Several years past, says Bosman, the Dutch had a fort, and drove a very considerable trade there; for besides the afflux of gold thither from all foreign parts, the country itself affords some gold mines. But they lost this footing in a very tragical manner: for the commander in chief of the negroes, being closely besieged, shot gold instead of bullets, hinting by signs that he was ready to treat, and afterwards trade with the besiegers. But in the midst of their negotiation he blew up himself and all his enemies at once, as unfortunately as bravely, putting an end to the siege and his life, and, like Sampson, revenging revenging his death upon his enemies. He had engaged a slave to stand ready with a lighted match, with which he was to touch the powder when he saw him stamp with his foot. This was punctually performed, unobserved by any but one of the company's slaves, who observing it, withdrew as silently as timely.

EGYPT, (kingdom of,) in Africa, was not only celebrated for being anciently the seat of learning and nursery of arts and sciences, from which Greece and other nations received them; but it was likewise stiled the granary of the world, the plenty or scarcity of the Roman empire depending on the good or bad harvest of this province. It is bounded on the E. by the Red Sea, and isthmus of Suez; on the N. it has the Mediterranean from Damietta to Alexandria, and beyond; on the W. it confines on Barbary, or kingdom of Tripoli, and desert of Barca; and on the S. on Nubia and the kingdom of Sennar. It lies between lat. 21 and 31, N. and long. 30, 36, is 626 miles long, from N. to S. and between a 100 and 200 in breadth from E. to W. The river Nile, which rises in Abyssinia, running through its whole length from S. to N. annually overflows it; which inundation usually begins in May or June, and is at its height in September following, from which time the waters decrease gradually.

This being the only river in the country, and not above two springs more, the inhabitants were obliged to build their towns on the banks of the Nile, on rising grounds, either natural or artificial; so that upon the overflowing of the river, these might look like islands; and to which at such times, there was no communication but by means of boats.

The Nile runs about the space of 230 leagues, exclusive of its windings, and is as it were enclosed on each side by a ridge of high mountains, one of which running along the W. coast on the side of Lybia, extends itself quite to the Mediterranean; but that on the E. side towards the Red Sea, goes no farther than Grand Cairo, where it leaves the river at liberty to spread itself in that part called the Delta.

Egypt is commonly divided into Lower, Middle, and Upper. The former, which is Egypt Proper, is a triangular island, hence called Delta, formed by the Levant, and the two main arms of the Nile, which parting five miles below Cairo, and the one directing its course N. W. falls into the Mediterranean at Rosetto; and the other N. E. into the sea at Damietta, or the ancient Pelusium; these two mouths being about 100 miles asunder.

The Lower Egypt having the greatest advantage from the inundations of the Nile, is the most fruitful part of the country; but the mud covering it after the flood is gone off, occasions an unhealthy vapour. From the mountains and sands enclosing Egypt on the E. and W. the intermediate valley would become intolerably hot, were it not for this periodical flood; nor would the soil, which is naturally barren, produce much without it; for seldom any rain falls unless in the Delta.

The middlemost division of Egypt, which begins at Cairo, extends only to Benesowef, and was anciently called Heptanonus, from the number of its names and governments, namely seven. The High or Upper Egypt, anciently called Thebais, and now Said, or Zaid, reaches quite up to Nubia, and the kingdom of Sennar.

Through Egypt canals are cut for refreshing their gardens and fields, and for saving water in dry weather; by which means Egypt becomes the most fertile country in all Africa, supplying Constantinople and other parts of Turkey in Europe, with grain, as it did anciently Rome and Italy. Upon the retiring of the waters of the Nile, they only harrow the seed into the mud, and in March following they have commonly their harvest. Their rice fields are supplied from their canals and reservoirs; and the lands which are not sown, yield excellent pasture for their cattle.

The climate of Egypt is extremely hot for two or three months before the overflowing of the river, and the musketos or gnats are intolerable in the night. Even the sands insinuate themselves into the closets and cabinets, and also into the bed-cloths, making them as if warmed with coals, which, with the very sultry winds in April and May, occasion sore eyes; an universal complaint among the natives, besides fevers and fluxes. But the greatest misfortune of Egypt is the plague, which commonly returns once in seven years, though this and other diseases are said to abate when the Nile begins to rise.

This country, though once so populous and full of noble cities, has now but very few places that deserve that name, hardly any of them being so much as inclosed with walls; for those of Rosetto, Damietta, Mausora, &c. formerly celebrated for their beauty and opulence, are no other than overgrown villages; and even that of Alexandria, being still well inhabited, and a considerable sea-port on the Mediterranean, has no other defence than its old walls, which are let go to decay.

Egypt is not only inhabited by the Copts, the ancient natives, but by Arabs, Moors, Turks, Greeks, Latins, Jews, Franks, and other foreign nations. Of the former, few are now left, vast numbers of them having been massacred at different times.

The ancient language of Egypt was the Coptic, which continued in use till Alexander the the Great conquered the country, who introduced the Greek; and this continued above 900 years, till the Greeks were driven out by the Arabs; since which time the Arabic hath continued the common language, as their nation is the most numerous; they are, however kept severely under by the Turks, as these have not only embraced the doctrine of Mahomet, but are even more zealous observers of it than the Turks; so this has continued the principal religion of the country.

What contributed most to the wealth and populousness of Egypt is its advantageous situation for commerce, the Mediterranean opening a trade to Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, Spain, and the northern coasts of Africa, the Red-sea into Persia and India, as well as Arabia.

Modern geographers mention little of Egyptian manufactures at this time: but captain Norden, who travelled to that country, at the expence of his present Danish majesty's grandfather, about the year 1737, has been pretty explicit on the subject of commerce; and from him we learn that the Egyptians export prodigious quantities of unmanufactured as well as prepared flax, thread, cotton, and leather of all sorts; calicoes, yellow wax, sal armoniac, saffron, sugar, senna, cassia. They trade with the Arabs for coffee, drugs, spices, calicoes, and other merchandises, which are landed at Suez, from whence they send them to Europe. Several European states have consuls resident in Egypt: But the customs of the Turkish government are managed by the Jews.

A number of English vessels arrive yearly at Alexandria, some of which are laden on account of the owners, but most of them are hired and employed as carriers to the Jews, Armenians, and Mahometan traders. Captain Norden seems to think, that the English consul and merchants make no great figure in Alexandria, but that they are in much less danger and less troubled than the French.

The constitution and government of this country seem to be but little known to modern times. It is certain that Egypt is subject to the Turks, and that even the meanest Janizary is respected by the natives. A viceroy is sent to Egypt under the title of pasha or basha of Cairo, and is one of the greatest officers in the Ottoman empire; but as the interior parts of Egypt are almost inaccessible to strangers, we know little of their government and laws. It is generally agreed, that the pacha is very careful how he provokes the little princes, or rather heads of clans, who have parcelled out Egypt among themselves, and whom he governs chiefly by playing one against another. He has, however a large regular army, and a militia, which serve as nurseries from whence the Ottoman troops are recruited. The keeping up this army employs his chief attention. It has sometimes happened that those pashas have employed their arms against their masters; they are sometimes displaced by the Porte, upon complaints from those petty princes. Capt. Norden and Dr. Pocock have given us the best, and indeed a very favourable account of those princes, who are called the Schechs of the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, who are sometimes too powerful to receive laws from the Turkish government. A certain number of beys, or begs, are appointed over the provinces of Egypt, under the pasha. Though these beys are designed to be checks upon him, yet they often assume independent powers.

The revenues are very inconsiderable, when compared to the natural riches of the country and the despotism of its government. Some say that they amount to 1,000,000*l.* sterl. but that two-thirds of the whole is spent in the country.

The three stone pyramids are the greatest curiosities in Egypt, the base of the largest taking up about 10 acres of ground, and running up to the height of 700 feet. The mummy-pits are the next curiosity, which, with the pyramids, stand on the W. side of the river, opposite to Grand Cairo. In these pits, where several embalmed bodies have been buried, some of them are said to be at least 3 or 4000 years old; and the coffins are set upright in niches in the wall.

EGYPTEN, a town in the duchy of Courland, in Poland. It lies 68 miles S. E. of Mittau. Lat. 56, 31, N. Long. 25, 40, E.

EHENHEIM, or UPPER EHENHEIM, in contradistinction from the noble village of Lower Ehenheim, a town of Lower Alsace, on the river Ergers, with a chapter.

EHINGEN, the name of two small towns in Germany, in Suabia, the one near the Danube, and the other on the Neckar; they belong to the house of Austria. Long. 9, 45, E. Lat. 48, 18, N.

EHN, a river of Lower Alsace, issuing from the Wasgau mountains, which afterwards takes the name of Ergers, and mingles its waters with the Ill.

EICHFIELD, or ESCHFELD, a small country of 20 miles extent, in the electorate of Mentz, in Germany, on the other side of the Weser, lying between Brunswick on the N. and Hesse on the S. See EIFIELD.

EIDERSTEDT, a province in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark, which is an exuberantly fruitful, rich, and profitable soil. It lies between the rivers Hever and Eider, extending four large miles from E. to W. but of unequal breadth, from three fourths to one and a half mile, being upwards of 14 in circuit. It is mostly marsh-land, producing oats, great quantities of wheat, as also beans, and very good pulse, yet but little rye. It yields excellent pot-herbs, and very good pasture for cattle. Great quantities of the butter and cheese of Eiderstedt are exported. The sheep are commonly productive of milk and wool; and the horses are large and hardy, and mostly bought by the inhabitants of N. Jutland and Ditmarsch. Here they have a scarcity of wood, for which reason it must be brought hither for some miles from the higher country; and they have as much fresh fish as they have occasion for, but in no great number, occasioned by the breaking in of the salt-water, by which means fresh-water fish are killed. The air, on account of the low and moist soil, is very unhealthy, particularly for strangers. At present the inhabitants are peasants; the most and principal part of which are of Friesian extraction. The high ponds on the N. and S. sides must be kept up at great trouble and expence. The government of the country is in a royal stadtholder and provincial bailiff, under whom are 16 counsellors as assessors, and two county-secretaries. The province is divided into the E. and W. parts.
9 Y beans,

E I

EICHTERNACH. See ECHTERNACH; a town of Luxemburg, in the Austrian Netherlands. It lies nine miles N. W. of Treves. Lat. 50, 5, N. Long. 6, 21, E.

EJEN, a place near Boe, in the diocese of Drontheim, in Norway, where a strong body of Swedes was defeated in the year 1612.

EIENDHOVEN, a town of Dutch Brabant, in the Netherlands. It lies 20 miles S. of Boisleduc. Lat. 51, 31, N. Long. 5, 26, E.

EIFIELD, or ELFIELD. See EICHFIELD, the capital of the country of the same name, and Rheingau, in Lower Saxony, in Germany. It lies on the Rhine, eight miles N. W. of Mentz, and belonging to the Elector of that name. Lat. 50, 12, N. Long. 7, 36, E.

EIMAYO, (Isle,) one of the new discoveries visited by Capt. Cook, in the Pacific ocean, in 1769, on which island Mr. Banks observed the transit of Venus. The situation and produce is nearly the same as that of Otaheite to which article we must refer the reader.

EIMBECK, a town of Grubenhagen, in Lower Saxony, in Germany, belonging to the Elector of Hanover. It lies 30 miles S. of Hildesheim. Lat. 51, 54, N. Long. 9, 51, E.

EINSIEDL, a mine-town of the Hither Circle of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary, where are good iron-pits, on the river Golnitz.

EISENBURG, a county of the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, on the confines of Stiria. It is inhabited by Hungarians, Germans, and Wends.

Of the same name was a very strong castle, in

E K

Latin called Castrum Ferreum, and the principal place in the county of Eisenburg; but the fortifications and buildings have been demolished, and its bishopric removed to Steinam Anger.

EISENSTADT, a royal free-town of the Farther Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It lies on the confines of Austria, and formerly belonged to it for some time, till the states of Hungary were assembled in 1625, at the diet of Oedenburg, and in 1637, and 1638, at that of Presburg, for the redemption of this mortgaged town.

EISENTHOR, a famous narrow pass of Transylvania, in Latin called Porta Ferrea, i. e. iron-door, as its first name signifies, by the Greeks, Acontisma, and by others the pass of Orla, which the strong castle of Posteni defends.

EISLEBEN, a town in the county of Mansfeldt and Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is remarkable for giving birth to the famous Martin Luther, the first reformer, and for the rich copper-mines in its neighbourhood. It lies seven miles E. of Mansfeldt. Lat. 51, 39, N. Long. 11, 56, E.

EISNACH. See EYSNACH.

EITDEVET, an ancient town of Africa, in the kingdom of Morocco, and province of Hea, seated on a steep mountain, and has famous schools. It is surrounded by two craggy rocks, and two rivers.

EJUB, or St. HIOB, a suburb of Constantinople, on its W. side.

EKATERINBURG, the Russian name of Catharinburg in Siberia; which see.

EKBEL, a small town in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, remarkable for a sulphureous spring.

EKEHOLM, near Slitehamn in Gottlandia and E. Gothland, the best and largest harbour in all Sweden, where is the citadel of Carlswerd.

EKENAS, or EKENES, in Latin, Peninsula Quercuum, i. e. the peninsula of oaks, is a small maritime town of Nylandia and Finland, in Sweden, with an indifferent harbour, several rocks and shelves before it rendering it of dangerous access. It is pleasantly situated on the gulph of Finland, and is the 78th town in the order of the general diet. Just by is the royal domain of the same name.

EKESIO, an inland town of Smolandia and E. Gothland, in Sweden. Here they drive a considerable trade in the sale of oxen; and they make also tapestry, bedsteads, stools, and other household implements. The tobacco of this place is very much prized. Its clergy belong to the diocese of Linkioping. It is the 58th town among those that have a seat and vote in the general diet. It lies 44 miles N. W. of Calmar, and 18 from the Wetterlake to the E. Lat. 57, 28, N. Long. 15, 12, E.

EKOLSUND, or ECKHOLMSUND, a fine royal domain of Uplandia, in Sweden Proper.

EKRENFORD. See ECKERNFORDE, in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. It lies 12 miles E. of Sleswick. Lat. 54, 54, N. Long. 9, 45, N.

EKRON, corruptedly Accaron, N. W. of Gath, in Palestine, was the northmost of all the five cities which gave name to the five lordships of the Philistines, and lay in the N. border of Judah, as appears from Joshua xv. 11. and so consequently a frontier town. It was once a place of great wealth and power, and is much spoken of in scripture; but it faded away to a great degree of obscurity; and although the name and even considerable vestiges of what it had once been, subsisted for many ages, it happens that no mention is made of it in prophane authors. It was famous for its idol Baalzebub, called the God of Ekron, which was next in repute and dignity to that of Dagon.

ELAH. The valley of Elah, or of the Terebinth, mentioned 2 Sam. xvii. 2. lay in the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem. Here it was that David slew Goliath. As to the height of this gigantic Philistine, according to the English standard, it was 12 feet eight inches and somewhat better than three-tenths. His coat of mail alone weighed 5000 shekels of brass, or upwards of 189 of our pounds Troy; and by the same rule the head of his spear, which weighed 600 shekels of iron, exceeded 22 of the same pounds. The weight of these and other parts of his armour and arms was not, we ought to believe, too heavy for so huge a person, his strength doubtless being in proportion to his stature.

ELAM, mentioned in several parts of Scripture, particularly in Jeremiah xlix. 35-38, was a kingdom on the river Ulai, to eastward of the Tigris. It was the Sufiana of the Greeks, and lay so opportunely for Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, (who was according to Jeremiah's prophecy to subdue it,) being as it were a borderer on him, that he can have been no very great while in the completion of its reduction; though by the words of the prophecy, Elam must have been a great and potent kingdom; and it seems to have waged war with the king of Touran or Scythia, beyond the river Oxus, with various success.

Chedorlaomer was the first king of Elam mentioned in scripture, and he extended his conquests over many provinces of Asia, as appears from Gen. xix. 4. and Josephus, Antiq. lib. i. cap. 10. Dr. Wells observes, that the name Elam, is taken sometimes in a strict sense, wherein it is distinguished from Sufiana and the adjoining provinces, and sometimes in a larger sense, so as to include Sufiana and other adjacent provinces. Hence Pliny and Ptolemy mention the Elemæi as a people inhabiting on the Persian gulph; and hence Daniel the prophet speaks of Shushan, the chief city of Sufiana, as lying in the province of Elam, chap. viii.

ELAPHITES, the name of the three islands Calamota, Isola di Mezzo, and Guipana, belonging to Ragusan Dalmatia, in Hungarian Illyria.

ELATEA, a city of Phocis, situate on the river Cephissus, and said to have been built by Elatus the son of Arcus the fourth king of Arcadia, and to have been peopled by a colony of that ancient nation, which came with him into Phocis.

ELBA, (isle of,) in Latin, Ilva, anciently Oethalia, in the Tuscan sea, and Middle Division of Italy, opposite to Piombino, being separated from the main land by the channel of the latter name, about 10 miles broad. The island is 40 miles in circuit, reckoning is gulphs, capes, &c. Here are two ports; the one to the N. W. called Porto Ferrai, with the fortified town of Cosinopoli, which belongs to the duke of Tuscany; the other to the S. E. called Porto Longone, is subject to Spain, as the whole island is under the protection of that crown, and mostly belongs to the duke of Piombino. It is very mountainous, and has mines yielding iron, lead, sulphur, marble, and some load-stone. It lies 14 miles S. W. of Piombino. Lat. 42, 26, N. Long. 11, 18, E.

ELBASSANO, a town of Albania, in European Turkey. It lies 38 miles S. E. of Durazzo. Lat. 41, 17, N. Long. 21, 15, E.

ELBE, a famous river of Germany. It rises on the confines of Silesia, runs S. to Konigsgratz in Bohemia, and afterwards N. W. till it has received the Muldaw at Malnic below Prague; then taking a N. course, it passes through Saxony, watering Dresden, Meissen, Wittemberg, and Magdeburg; when running N. E. through Brandenburg, it is joined by the Havel; after which it separates Lunenburg from Magdeburg, flows between Bremen and Holstein, visits Hamburg, and, continuing its course by the fortress of Gluckstadt, falls into the German ocean below the last mentioned place.

From ships of 3 or 400 tons coming up to Hamburg, which is about 70 miles from the sea, it hence seems to be navigable higher than any river in Europe, unless the different windings of the Thames exceed that distance; and were the way clear of bridges in and above London, the navigation here would surpass it. On the Elbe vast quantities of goods are imported and exported to and from Germany, and upon it toll is paid at Gluckstadt to the king of Denmark, at Stadt, to the elector of Hanover, and likewise to the duke of Holstein and city of Hamburg, within their respective jurisdictions.

ELBEUF, a small town of Upper Normandy, in France, upon the Seine. Here are fine manufactures of cloth and tapestry. The neighbourhood abounds with corn. In the place is but one parochial church, and a convent. It lies eight miles S. of Rouen. Lat. 49, 22, N. Long. 1, 20, E.

ELBING, one of the Hanse towns, a well-built, populous, and strong city, in the palatinate of Marienburg, and the only port, except Dantzick, in all Polish Prussia, being subject to Poland. Its fortifications are old, and it stands on the river of its own name, and the Frieschehaff, a bay of the Baltic sea, near the mouth of the Vistula. It is a place of considerable trade, principally in sturgeon, butter, cheese, mead, and corn. It is divided into the upper and lower towns; its streets are narrow, the houses high, and old fashioned. Here are five churches, the largest of which is that of St. Nicholas, and belongs to the Roman Catholics; but the academy is Lutheran. It has been taken several times. In 1703 Charles XII. of Sweden being admitted with his troops into the place upon his parole, made himself master of it, and levied a heavy tax: but the Muscovites took it by storm in 1710, and found therein great numbers of cannon, and proportionable ammunition. It lies 18 miles N. E. of Marienburg, and 35 E. of Dantzick. Lat. 54 21, N. Long. 19, 15, E.

ELBING, (river of,) in Polish Prussia and palatinate of Marienburg. It issues from the Drausen lake, runs by the city of its own name, and uniting with the Pfeil and Nogat, falls into the Frische-haff. The Elbing and Drausen receive several new rivers, among which is the Fischau, with a ferry on it near the town of Elbing.

ELBINGRODE, a small town of Grubenhagen, in Brunswick, in Germany, belonging to the elector of Hanover. Its bailiff, in December 1744, arrested marshal Belleisle and his brother here as spies, being travelling without passports; 60 miles S. E. from Hanover, and 26 from Goslar. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 10, 4, E.

ELBURG, an ancient town of Guelderland, on a small river which falls into the Zuyder-zee, forming there the port. Over the river are five stone bridges, one of which is the fish-market. It lies 10 miles N. E. of Harderwyck, and 30 N. of Arnheim. Lat. 52, 28, N. Long. 5, 38, E.

ELCATIF, or CATIF, the capital of a territory in Arabia Felix, in Asia, at the bottom of a small bay in the Persian gulph. It lies 320 miles S. of Bassora. Lat. 25, 15, N. Long. 38, 49, E.

ELCHE, a pretty, well-built town of Valencia, in Spain. The neighbouring country abounds with wine, dates, and fine fruit, and has also forests of olive, and very large palm trees.

ELCAVENTO DE CALATRAVA, (see CALATRAVA) a burgh of La Mancha, in New Castile, in Spain. It is the principal place of the order of Calatrava; and lies in a fertile plain, abounding with corn, wine, and pastures.

ELDA, though a small town, yet is the capital of a county, in Valencia, one of the provinces in Spain.

ELDEN-HOLE, or EDEN-HOLE, one of the wonders of the Peak in Derbyshire, is a frightful chasm in a rock, in the midst of an open field that has a gentle descent S. The mouth of it is about nine yards over one way, and 28 or 30 the other; but downwards, as far as can be perceived, its dimensions grow less and less. Its depth could never yet be discovered, though various attempts have been made for that purpose. In the reign of queen Elizabeth the earl of Leicester hired a poor man to venture down in a basket, which accordingly he did to the depth of more than 200 yards; but, being drawn up again, he had lost his senses, and died a few days after frantic. Mr. Cotton, author of the Wonders of the Peak, let down 884 yards of line (whereof 80 were wet,) without being able to find a bottom; but, the descent not being every where perpendicular, on a second trial the plummet stopt before it reached half so much. When strangers go to see this hole, it is usual to throw in large stones, which are heard to rebound from side to side, till the sound, rattling like thunder, grows weaker and weaker, and is at length entirely lost.

About 15 years ago, the owner of the pasture in which the chasm called Elden-hole is situated, having lost several cattle, agreed with two men to fill it up. These men spent some days in throwing down many loads of stones, but seeing no effect of their labour, ventured down it themselves, and found at the bottom a vast cavern; upon which, despairing to procure a quantity of stones sufficient to fill it up, they desisted from their work.

Mr. Lloyd having received this account from one of the men, and being assured that there were no damps at the bottom, went down himself.

The entrance is a chink, in the direction of N. and S. about 30 yards long, and nine wide.

Mr. Lloyd was let down by two ropes, about 40 fathoms long. For the first 20 yards, though he descended obliquely, he could assist himself with his hands and his feet; but, below this, the rock projected in large irregular crags, so that he found it very difficult to pass. When he had descended 10 yards more, he found the rope, by which he was suspended, at least six yards from the perpendicular. From hence, the breadth of the chink was about three yards, and the length about six. The sides were very irregular, and the crags were covered covered with moss, being besides, wet and dirty. Within 14 yards of the bottom, the rock opened on the east side, and he swung till he reached the floor of the cave, which was at the depth of 62 yards from the mouth; the light, however, which came from above was sufficient to read any print. There he found the cavern consist of two parts; that in which he alighted was like an oven; the other, where he first began to swing, was a vast dome, shaped like the inside of a glass house, and a small-arched passage formed a communication between them. In this passage, the stones which had been thrown in at the top formed a slope, extending from the wall at the west side of the first dome, almost to the bottom of the second cave, or oven, so that the farther end of the cave was lower by 25 yards than the place where he alighted.

The diameter of this cavern he judged to be about 50 yards. The top he could not trace with his eye, but had reason to believe that it extended to a prodigious height; for, when he was nearly at the top of one of the encrusted rocks, which was an elevation of at least twenty yards, he could see no closure of the dome, though he then saw much farther than when he stood at the bottom.

After climbing up a few loose stones, on the S. side of the second cavern, he descended again, through a small slit, into a little cave, about four yards long, and two yards high, which was lined throughout with a kind of sparkling stalactites, of a fine deep yellow, with some small stalactical drops hanging from the roof.

He found a noble column, above 90 feet high, of the same kind of incrustation, facing the first entrance. As he proceeded to the N. he came to a large stone that was covered with the same substance, and, under it, he found a hole two yards deep, that was uniformly lined with it. From the edge of this hole sprung a rocky ascent, sloping like a buttress against the side of the cavern, and consisting of vast, solid, round masses, of the same substance and colour. Up this ascent he climbed to the height of about 60 feet, and got some fine pieces of the stalactites, which hung from the craggy sides of the cavern which joined the projection he had ascended.

When he got down, which was not effected without considerable difficulty and danger, he proceeded in the same direction, and soon came to another pile of incrustations, of a different kind and colour, these being much rougher, and not tinged with yellow, but brown. At the top of this he found a small cavern, opening into the side of the vault, which he entered. Here he saw vast drops of the stalactites, hanging, like icicles, from every part of the roof, some of which were four or five feet long, and as thick as a man's body. The greater part of the walls of the large cavern, or vault, was lined with incrustations of three kinds; the first was the deep yellow stalactites; the second was a thin coating, resembling a light stone-coloured varnish; this covered the limestone, and reflected the light of the candles with great splendor; the third sort was a rough efflorescence, every shoot of which resembled a kind of rose flower.

He returned through the arch which separates the two vaults, re-ascending the slope of loose stones, which greatly lessened the magnificence of the entrance into the inner cavern.

When he had again fastened the rope to his body, he gave the signal to be drawn up, which he found much more dangerous and difficult than to be let down, because his weight drew the rope into clefts between the fragments of the rock, which made it stick, and his body was continually jarring against the sides, notwithstanding all the defence he could make with his hands. The rope also loosened the stones over his head, the fall of which he dreaded every moment; and, if any of them had fallen, he must inevitably have perished. As he was obliged to ascend with his face towards the wall, he could not make any particular observations on the rocks that were behind, or on each side of him. He saw, however, under the projection of the rock, where the passage first became narrow, the entrance of a cavern, which seemed to penetrate a great way, but he could not get into it.

A gentleman, who lives upon this spot, told Mr. Lloyd, after his return from this subterranean expedition, that there was formerly, in the floor of the great cavern, somewhere near the large heap of stones, the mouth of a second shaft, which had been covered by the miners. It was said to have gone down a vast depth farther, and to have had water at the bottom.

There is some reason to believe, that this water is the continuation of a subterraneous river, which runs out of the mouth of the great cavern at Castleton; for a large quantity of grit-stone is observed to grow in the earth near Elden-hole, but none near Castleton, and yet, on high floods, the river at Castleton washes great quantities of that grit-stone, in fragments, out of the mouth of Castleton cavern.

There is also a tradition which confirms this opinion. As a poor old woman, many years ago, was chasing her goose, it fled from her, and, to her great grief, fell down Eden-hole. Some days afterwards, however, the good woman had the satisfaction to hear that her goose had been seen at the mouth of Castleton cavern.

ELEN, a river of Cumberland, between which and the mouth of the Derwent, were fortifications supposed to be Roman, and erected to prevent the landing of the Scots and Irish, who infested these coasts. The ruins are still visible.

ELENBOGEN, or ELNBOGEN, a circle of Bohemia in Germany, being rather an appendage to, than part of it. It is bounded on the N. by Voigtland, on the E. by the circle of Satz, on the S. by that of Pilsen, and on the W. by the palatinate of Bavaria and Franconia. It is watered by the river Eger, and by the Zwota, Tepla, and Weteritz, which unite their streams with it.

ELENBOGEN, the capital of the last-mentioned circle of its name. It is a well fortified town, and opens a passage to Saxony. It lies on the Eger, in form of an elbow, whence it takes its name. It has also a citadel upon a steep rock, surrounded by the river and neighbouring hills. It suffered much, and was taken several times in the German wars. It lies 20 miles E. of Egra. Lat. 50, 22, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

ELENBOROUGH, a place in Cumberland, near the river Elen above mentioned, where, it is said, the first cohort of Dalmatians were garrisoned, antiquities and inscriptions being daily dug up hereabouts.

ELEPHANTA, an island in the East Indies, of which Mr. Grosse has given the following account:

Overagainst the castle of Bombay, at the distance of five miles, lies the very small, but famous, island of Elephanta. It cannot, at most, be above three miles in compass, and consists of almost all hill; at the foot of which as you land, you see, just above the shore, on your right, an elephant, coarsely cut out in stone, of the natural bigness, and at some little distance, not impossible to be taken for a real elephant, from the stone being naturally of the colour of that beast. It stands on a platform of stones of the same colour. On the back of this elephant was placed standing, another young one, appearing to have been all of the same stone, but has been long broken down. Of the meaning, or history of this image, there is no tradition old enough to give any account.

Returning then to the foot of the hill, you ascend an easy flant, which about half way up the hill brings you to the opening or portal of a large cavern, hewn out of a solid rock, into a magnificent temple; for such surely it may be termed, considering the immense workmanship of such an excavation; and seems to me a far more bold attempt than that of the pyramids of Egypt. There is a fair entrance into this subterraneous temple, which is an oblong square, of the length of about 80 or 90 feet, by 40 broad. The roof is nothing but the rock cut flat at top, and in which I could not discern any thing that did not shew it to be all of one piece. It is about 10 feet high, and supported towards the middle, at equi-distance from the sides, and from one another, with two regular rows of pillars of a singular order. They are very massive, short in proportion to their thickness, and their capitals bear some resemblance to a round cushion, pressed by the super-incumbent mountain, with which they are also of one piece. At the further end of this temple are three gigantic figures, the face of one of them is at least five feet in length, and of a proportionable breadth. But these representations have no reference or connection either to any known history, or to the mythology of the Gentoos. They had continued in a tolerable state of preservation and wholeness, considering the remoteness of their antiquity, until the arrival of the Portuguese, who made themselves masters of the place, and in the blind fury of their bigotry, not suffering any idols but their own, they must have been at even some pains to maim and deface them, as they now remain, considering the hardness of the stone. It is said they even brought field-pieces to the demolition of images which so greatly deserved to be spared for the unequalled curiosity of them. Of this queen Catherine of Portugal was, it seems, so sensible, that she could not conceive that any traveller would return from that side of India, without visiting the wonders of this cavern; of which too the sight appeared to me to exceed all the descriptions I had heard of them. About two-thirds of the way up this temple, on each side, and fronting each other, are two doors or outlets into smaller grotts or excavations, and freely open to the air. Near and about the doorway, on the right hand, are also several mutilated images, single and in groups. In one of the last, I remarked a kind of resemblance to the story of Solomon dividing the child.

This place too being so near Bombay, affords the English inhabitants not only an easy opportunity of gratifying their curiosity in visiting so remarkable a spot, but occasionally of a very agreeable party of pleasure. Sometimes, in the way thither, they dine at Butcher's Island, which is two miles nearer to Bombay, on account of the convenience of the officer's house to receive them, an ensign's guard being kept there. Others again prefer carrying their provisions with them, and dine in the cave itself, than which, in the very sultriest days of the heats, there cannot be imagined a cooler, or pleasanter retreat. For though the air be almost on fire round you, you are no sooner entered the cave, than you are refreshed with a sensible coolness. Here are two trees in which the Toddy-bird takes sanctuary, viz. the toddy tree, so called from thence, and the brabb tree. On both these, birds build nests, and hang them to the boughs by such slender threads, that the squirrels cannot get at them. The brabb tree is much like the cocoa, with a tuft on the top of it, which, boiled, eats like cauliflower. The fruit of it is less than that of the cocoa, but the wine made of it is better.

ELEPHANT, or ELEPHANTINE ISLAND, so called from the elephants found in it; a tract in the river Nile, and Upper Egypt, in Africa. It is about a mile long, and a quarter of a mile broad to the S. It terminates in a point to the N. and lies opposite to Esne; though Dr. Pocock alone places it higher up the Nile. Here was the boundary of the Roman empire, and the navigation of that river by the Egyptians terminated here. It is a pleasant, fruitful spot, and on it was once a small city, where are still to be seen the remains of an Egyptian temple and other antiquities. Lat. 23, 26, N. Long. 32, 5, E.

ELEUSIS, now called Lepfina, once a considerable city of Achaia, the modern Livadia, a province of Turkey in Europe. Here was a stately temple of Ceres, and much resorted to. Its ruins of fine white marble, and admirable sculpture, &c. shew this to have been a superb edifice. It has been often pillaged by pirates, and now almost depopulated.

ELEUTHERA, called also Saorus and Aorus, was an inland city of Crete, and in the Roman times a place of great strength, well peopled. It is asserted by Dio that the walls, or at least a strong tower of this city, after a continued operation for several nights, were thrown down by the force of vinegar.

ELEUTHERA, one of the Bahama or Lucaya islands in America, with a small fort and settlement belonging to Great Britain. It lies on the great Bahama bank. The soil of this island and Harbour Island, which lies on the end of it, is reckoned better than Providence island, and produces great quantities of pine-apples. The climate is so healthy, that it is not uncommon to find persons there above 100 years old. Long. 76, 5, to 77. Lat. 25, 26.

ELEUTHERUS river, mentioned in the Macabees, is by Shaw set down as the boundary of Syria and Phœnice.

ELFDAL, one of the parishes in Swedish Thaland, or Dalecarlia, remarkable, as in it they have a peculiar sort of language, very much resembling the old Gothic and Islandish, with a three-fold dialect or pronunciation of it. This a Swede does understand, but a German may much sooner.

ELFELD, a fortified town in the electorate of Mentz, in Germany, on the N. side of the Rhine, and the capital of the Rhingaw. See EI-FIELD, or EICHFELD.

ELFKARLESBY, a royal seat of Uplandia, in Sweden Proper, with a village where is kept an annual fair. Here is also a salmon fishery, and a considerable trade in that fish and other kinds.

ELFSBORG, (Old,) or GAMLA ELFSBORG, was formerly a town and strong castle on the sea, in West Gothland, in Sweden. It has stood out many hard sieges, and several attacks, especially in the turbulent 15th century. It has been burnt several times; and ever since the year 1660 the fortrefs has been demolished.

ELGEMUHA, a pretty town of Hascora, a province of Africa, on the top of a craggy, high rock. It consists of 1500 families, who are partly employed in making shields from buffalo hides, and partly in Husbandry; the neighbouring lands being covered with vines, olives, and other fruit-trees. Just by is a mountain with good iron-ore, which is fabricated into bars, and sold all over the province.

ELGIN, one of the shires in the middle division of Scotland, which, together with that of Nairn, and some other districts, constitutes the country called Murrayland. Its S. side is called the Braes of Murray or Brae-Murray, as the S. E. part is called Strathspey, or the valley through which the water of Spey runs, which river bounds it on the E. and the shire of Nairn on the W. It has Aberdeenshire and the county of Badenoch on the S. and Invernesshire, according to Moll, on the N. But this latter boundary seems to be that of Murrayland, taken in the larger sense, as reaching beyond the shire of Nairn, and confining on the country near Inverness.

The shire of Elgin lies on the E. side of the water of Findorn, betwixt that and the Spey; and is computed to be 24 miles in length, and 21 in breadth. The air is healthy, and the winter mild. The S. side, as has been said, is mountainous; but abounds with pasture, as the low country does exuberantly with corn, their harvest being soon ripe; and it is proverbially called the gynell or granary of the north. Here (meaning particularly in Strathspey) are large woods of fir-trees, 10 miles long; and some woods of oak. Besides the Findorn and Spey above mentioned, the Loffy, Ptolemy's Loxa, waters Elginshire, rising a few miles above the town of the same name, and falls into the sea about six miles below it, over which is a stone bridge. It abounds with salmon, taken in a few of the summer-months, and within the space of one mile at the village of Germach. From the village at the mouth of the Loffy, the town of Elgin is daily supplied with sea-fish.

ELGIN, the capital of the shire of the same name last-mentioned. It is a royal burgh, which constituting one district with those of Bamff, Cullen, Kintore, and Inverary, sends a member alternately to the British parliament. It rather stands E. of the Loffy, than upon that river, in a delightful plain, and very fruitful though sandy soil. Over the river is a small stone-bridge. It was formerly the see of a bishop, who usually resided at the castle of Spyney, about a mile off, a fine seat, but now in lay-lands. It stands near a lake, abounding with all sorts of wild-fowl, particularly swans. Here the sheriff keeps his courts, it has a weekly market, and is the seat of a presbytery, consisting of 13 parishes. Here are the ruins of a very stately cathedral, founded in 1224, commonly called the chancery, likewise corrupted for canonry-church, as appears from the rudera, some of the walls being still standing, especially part of the apse, which Maitland says, even surpasses Westminster-abbey in architecture; and he farther writes, that Elgin may be called the Richmond of Scotland; but excepting its cattle fairs, has little trade.

In this town they have the two-pennies Scots act for repairing the harbour of Loffy, which may be looked upon as the port of Elgin, and for other public purposes. The place consists of one large street running E. and W. with several wynds or lanes, on each side; also a handsome church and steeple in the middle of the said large street, where are some houses built upon arches, which, with the intermediate pillars, form agreeable piazzas, and shelter for the inhabitants from sun and rain. It lies five or six miles S. of Murray-frith, and 36 E. of Inverness, though computed no more than 28. and eight from Forres. Long. 2, 25, W. Lat. 57, 40, N.

ELHAM. See ELTHAM.

ELHAMA, in the kingdom of Tripoli, Barbary, is an ancient town built by the Romans, stands about five leagues from Capes, and is surrounded by a stout wall of square stones; but the territory and people are now so poor, that piracy and robbing are their main living. It is seated near a lake, called the Lake of Lepers, because it cures that disease. Long. 10, 51. Lat. 34, 0, N.

ELIAS, (island of,) in the northern part of Siberia, found to lie in lat. 59, 40, N.

ELIAS-CAPE, a vast promontory that seems to cover its head in the clouds on the western extremity of N. America, visited by Captain Cook, in 1778, situated in lat. 59, 53, N. Long 217, 23, E.

ELIM, as mentioned in Exodus xv. was one of the encampments of the Israelites, where they found

12 fountains of water, and 70 palm-trees. This seems to have been esteemed a very pleasant and fruitful place, in comparison of the desert and barren places about it.

ELIS, a kingdom of ancient Greece, was it is reasonably supposed, at first peopled by the descendants of Elisha, son of Javan, and grandson of Japhet, Gen. x. 2, and 4. if not by Elisha himself, from whom this territory at least, if not the whole peninsula, was called Elis. Elis was situated on the W. side of Peloponnesus, having the Ionian sea on that side, Arcadia E. Achaia N. and the bay of Cyparissos or Chalonites, now Capo di Tornese, with Messenia S. Its extent from E. to W. was at the widest about 48 min. that is from 22, 10, to almost 23 E. long. and from N. to S. about 60 min. or from 27, 20, to 28, 20 N. lat. Its chief cities were Elis, Olympia, and Pifa.

ELIS, (city,) was situate on the river Peneus, and almost in the heart of the kingdom, and the metropolis of it. It was famous among many other things for a large spacious place called the Xystos, where the candidates for the Olympic games were obliged to initiate themselves for some time by diet, exercise, and other such preparatives; before they were admitted to appear on the Olympic plains.

Here was also the palace of Augeas, one of their kings, and the famous stables, the cleansing of which proved a task fit only for the great Hercules. It is said to have held 3000 oxen, and to have been 30 years without cleaning; so that when Hercules undertook to do it in one day, on condition he gave him his daughter in marriage, he only turned the river Alpheus, (or Peneus, according to some) into it, which carried off all the filth in the time prefixed.

ELIZABETH-ISLANDS, several small islands on the S. end of Falmouth, in Barnstable county, Plymouth county, New-England. They are S. of Buzzard-bay, and W. of Martha's Vineyard. The largest is Nashawn, the next Tinkers, the third Slokums; besides which there are two much smaller called Kuttihunt-isles; which are as far distant from the coast of Barnstable county, N. E. as the coast of Bristol county W.

ELIZABETH, a town of Essex county, and the most considerable of New-Jersey. It lies three miles within a creek, opposite to the W. part of Staten-island. Here the English settled first, and it has thriven most; so that it was, till the present troubles, the seat of government of the two provinces of East and West Jersey, and of the judicial courts and assemblies; though great endeavours were used by the Scotch proprietors of East Jersey, in 1683, to remove the courts from thence to Perth-amboy. The town of Elizabeth has above 250 families, and 40,000 acres of plantation. The proprietors had one here, which went by the name of the farm.

On January 27, 1779, a large magazine of American stores was destroyed here by the British forces.

ELIZABETH-ISLAND, (Queen,) in the straits of Magellan, in S. America. Capt. Chipperton having been at this place in the year 1719, found the soil dry but barren, yet abounding with fallaherbs, wild-fowl, and shell-fish. He anchored also in a bay of this island, which for its depth they call No-bottom-bay.

ELLEHOLM, or ELKHOLM, a town with a castle, but now only a church village of Blekingia, in South Gothland, Sweden, on an island in the river near Morum, about half a mile from Carlshamn. It has a good harbour, where a considerable trade was carried on; but the privilege of the township is removed to Solwitzborg, 24 miles W. of Carlscroon. Lat. 56, 21, N. Long. 14, 27, E.

ELLEN, a place in Aberdeenshire, and Middle Division of Scotland; noted only as the seat of a presbytery, comprehending eight parishes.

ELLENENA, LENERA, ELLERENA, or LDERDNA, an inconsiderable city of the Spanish Estremadura. It belongs to the order of St. Jago, and lies in a fruitful country, at the foot of the mountains Sierra Morena. Here are two parishes, three monasteries, and four nunneries; 54 miles N. E. of Seville, and 49, S. E. of Merida. Lat. 38, 18, N. Long. 5, 31, W.

ELLEDON, or HELLEDON, a market-town of Northumberland, where is a fair kept annually on August 26; 26 miles from Newcastle.

ELLESMERE, a town of Shropshire, with a market on Tuesdays, and four fairs, on the third Tuesday in April, Whit-Tuesday, August 25, and November 14, for horses, sheep, and horned cattle. It is seated on the side of a large meer, in a small, but rich and fertile district of the same name, 16 miles N. N. W. of Shrewsbury, and 172 N. W. of London. Long. 2, 55, W. Lat. 52, 53 N.

ELMEDIN, or ALENDINE, a populous city of Hascora, one of the provinces in Africa, in a fruitful bottom surrounded with hills, it is said to have 1000 houses, most of its inhabitants living well and at ease.

ELMESWORTH, Isle of Wight, in West-Medina, has a fair on Easter Monday, and July 18.

ELNE, or ELNA, in Latin, Helena, the ancient ent Illiberis in Rouffillon, in France. It stands upon a hill, and on the river Tec. It has often been pillaged; and was the see of a bishop, till removed in 1602 to Perpignan, S. E. from which it lies 14 miles. Lat. 42, 39, N. Long. 2, 56, E.

ELNE, a river in Cumberland, which runs into the Irish sea at Elenborough.

ELCEA, ELÆA, or ELEA, in Æolis, bordered upon Great Myfia, about 20 miles from Pergamus, and stood on the Ægean sea, near the mouth of the Caicus, over against Metelina, and had a convenient harbour. It was divided from Lesbos by an arm of the sea, called the gulph of Elcea. It is now but a village called Alea. E. long. 27, 23. Lat. 39, 5.

ELORA, a place in the kingdom of Decan, one of the provinces of the Mogul in Asia, five (Thevenot says three) leagues from Doltabad towards Bombay, through a road cut out of a rocky mountain; it is as remarkable as Persepolis, for temples, mosques, statues, &c. cut out of rocks.

ELPHIN, is of no other note than as the see of a bishop in the county of Roscommon and province of Connaught in Ireland, five miles from Tulsk, and twice as many from Boyle.

ELSA, one of the smaller rivers in Tuscany, in the Middle Division of Italy, which unites its stream with the Arno, the capital river of this duchy.

EL SINBURG, or HELSINBORG, a very ancient staple or trading town of Scania and South Gothland, in Sweden, at the foot and declivity of a high mountain, on the top of which it formerly stood. It has been ruined by the wars preceeding and since the year 1672, being now an open place, with only a battery of a few guns. The harbour is so shallow that ships must ride near Elfsneur, nine miles W. of it on the opposite side of the Sound. This is the direct post-road over that channel into Denmark; and at this place they manufacture great quantities of coarse caps and boots; but their other fabrics hardly keep up their character. In their ribbon-weavery young girls usually work instead of young men. It is the 18th town in the order of the general diet.

From the mountain in the neighbourhood issues the Helsingburg spring, which furnishes the town every minute with 43 large measures of quite cold, clear, and well-tasted water, which is fetched from thence, and shipped off in large quantities. Lat. 56, 2, N. Long. 13, 20, E.

ELSINEUR, ELSINORE, or HELSINGOER, a town of Seeland, in Denmark, on that strait of the sea called the Sound. This, next to the capital, is the richest and most elegant town in the island. It has two churches, and a grammar-school, school, in which 33 poor scholars are educated and maintained gratis, a good hospital, and the king's custom-house. Elsinore has a considerable trade, and is famous both on account of its being the place by which the Swedes and Norwegians usually pass into Demark, and for the toll paid here by every ship that sails through the Sound. The celebrated castle of Cronsborg stands on the narrowest part, and was certainly intended to command the entrance of the channel. It is a fine Gothic chateau or palace, built early in the last century by Christian IV. and was then often honoured with the royal residence. It is of a square form, and within is a fine quadrangle. The turrets at the corners are very superb, and in the most improved stile of Gothic architecture. There is nothing in the royal apartments, except some gilt leather chairs, of equal antiquity with the castle, and several daubings of their kings prancing about on white steeds.

The late unfortunate queen Matilda, was confined for some time a state-prisoner in this place. She was brought here on the 17th of January 1772, when the royal apartments were by no means fit for her reception; the colonel commandant therefore, with equal humanity and politeness, resigned his own to her majesty. There is a little hunting-seat or palace about a quarter of a mile from Elsinore, whither the king drives frequently for a few hours in the summer. Nothing worth seeing distinguishes the building, but the prospect from the roof is beautiful beyond expression. It looks down on the town of Elsinore and the castle of Cronsborg, and commands beyond these the Sound and coast of Sweden for a long way.

King Christian II. would have given up Elsinore to the Dutch, only that the inhabitants strenuously opposed it, and in 1517, he removed the toll to Copenhagen, but it did not continue long there. The damages done it by the enemy or accidental fire, have been soon and easily repaired. It lies 18 miles N. of Copenhagen. Lat. 56, N. Long. 13, 23, E.

ELSNABBEN, or HIELMSNABBEN, a secure harbour of Sudor-Torn in Sundermania, in Sweden Proper.

ELSTOW, formerly Helenstow, a nunnery erected in William the Conqueror's time, to the Virgin Mary, and to Helena, the Emperor Constantine's mother. It stood a little below Bedford, in the county of this name. Though the foundation has been long ruined; yet near its site two annual fairs, are held on May 14, and November 25.

ELTHAM, in Kent, seven miles from London, in the road to Maidstone, and in the midway between Bromley and the Thames. A palace was built and here bestowed upon Eleanor wife of king Edward I. King Edward II. resided here constantly, and his son, who was born here, was therefore called John of Eltham. The palace here was much enlarged by the kings his successors, who when the court was kept at Greenwich, often retired hither; and here were made those called the statutes of Eltham, by which the king's house is still governed. The princess, afterwards queen Elizabeth, who was born at Greenwich, was often brought hither by her nurses for better air. There are few or no traces to be seen of the palace; nevertheless it is a pleasant place. Here are also two charity-schools.

At this pleasant market-town are four annual fairs; namely, Palm-Monday, Easter-Monday, Whitfun-Monday, and October 20. It lies two miles from Woolwich.

ELTZEN, a town in the bishopric of Hildesheim, and on the confines of the duchy of Calenberg in Lower Saxony, in Germany. It was called Aulica, as being Charlemagne's residence, and the see of a bishop till it was translated to Hildesheim, N. W. of which it lies about five miles. Lat. 52, 18, N. Long. 9, 40, E.

ELVAS, a district called Correiaçao, in the province of Alentejo in Portugal. It contains besides six towns, the city of ELVAS, anciently Helva, from the Helvi, a people of Gaul. It is a good fortress, and has a castle called Santa Luzia. The city itself lies high on the Guidana, and the aforesaid castle still higher, on the uppermost peak, besides another castle on that river. Here are four churches including the cathedral, seven convents, a house of mercy, and an hospital. It is the seat of the civil courts. The diocese consists of 50 parishes. Among the curiosities of this city is a very large cistern, into which water is conveyed by means of an aqueduct about a mile long, and so high near the town, that it requires a three-fold row of arches over one another to support it.

In the city and its district, consisting of 10 parishes, are reckoned 12,408 souls, and of these the number in the town is 2500. The Spaniards took the place in 1580, but in 1659, they were defeated in the neighbourhood by the Portuguese. The country round it produces wine and excellent oil: 17 miles from Bajadox. Lat. 38, 39, N. Long. 7, 28, W.

ELWANG, a town of Ottingen, in the circle of Suabia, Germany. It lies 40 miles N. of Ulm. Lat. 48, 50, N. Long. 10, 20, E.

ELY, (city and county of,) a large town of Cambridgeshire, but not populous or handsome, though ancient. It stands high, in the principal part of the fenny country, called the Isle of Ely, being being furrounded with the Ouse and other streams. It is the see of a bishop, whose minster or cathedral and palace are the principal ornaments of the city. Here is great plenty of provisions, particularly garden-stuff, with which the neighbouring country is supplied; and particularly noted for vast quantities of strawberries. The city in its civil government is subordinate to the bishop, and is the only one in England that sends no members to parliament. It has a free-school, and two charity-schools, the latter by subscription. Its principal street on the E. is full of springs. The weekly market here is on Saturday, and annual fairs are held on Ascension-day, and Thursday of the week in which October 18 falls on. It lies 12 miles from Cambridge, and 69 N. of London.

ELY, a small town of Fifeshire in the S. of Scotland. It lies on the coast, and has a safe harbour with a stone-mole, it resembles the Cobb, at Lyme, but does not project so far into the sea. It lies on the W. side of the Leven-mouth, five miles from the town of Leven. The coals from the earl of Weem's pits, and what salt is made there are brought to this place.

ELY, a village of Glamorganshire, in S. Wales, with one fair on July 22.

ELYMA, a sea-port city in the country of the Elymiotæ, in Macedonia, as mentioned by Pliny.

ELYMAIS, or as Strabo calls it, Elymatis, was a province of Persia, lying between the rivers Eulæus and Orontes, and extending from the confines of Media to the Erythræan sea, or Persian gulph. It was formerly divided into three great districts, Mesabatene, Gabene or Gabiene, and Carbiana, and contained the following cities; Seleucia or anciently Soloce, on the banks of the Hedypus or Hedypnus; Sahrata, at a small distance from mount Casyrus; Badaca, on the Eulæus; and Elymais, the metropolis of the province, famous for a rich temple consecrated to Diana. We must not confound this city with that of Persepolis, called also by some Elymais, as Strabo informs, a powerful people, inured to the toils of war, skilful bowmen, &c. and never subdued either by the Syro-Macedonian or Parthian kings, but governed by their own princes. He dates the rise of this kingdom from the downfall of the Persian monarchy. Their kings are often spoken of by the ancients, but not one by name. All we know of them is, they assisted Antiochus the Great in his wars with Rome; but afterwards cut off both him and his army in defence of their temple.

EM-A, a river of Smolandia, in E. Gothland in Sweden, where there is a fishery for salmon, and other fish.

EMANUEL, (cape,) or Cabo Manoel, on the coast of Nigritia, is five leagues distant from Capé Verde, being a flat hill covered all over with evergreen trees, in such order that they exactly represent the form of an amphitheatre, on the S. side. The Portuguese gave it this name in honour of Emanuel, 14th king of Portugal, successor to king John II. who died in 1495. The country about abounds in pintado hens, partridges, hares, turtle-doves, roe-bucks, goats, and a multitude of horned cattle.

EMBAL, a town or large village of Guinea and Negroland in Africa, where the king of Cajor has a palace, with pallisadoes and long rows of trees, with a fine square before it. It lies 10 leagues to the eastward of Macaya.

EMBDEN, the capital of a county of its name, a large and populous imperial city of East-Friesland, on the river Ems and the Dollart-bay. On the land-side it is fortified by a double ditch, bulwarks, and bastions, and on the S. by a strong wall and the river. The harbour, by means of the isle of Neffa, is one of the largest and most convenient in Germany. By artificial canals vessels can be brought up into the heart of the town, and by sluices the country round it may be laid under water. The houses are neat and high; and the town-hall is magnificent. Here they drive a good trade; and tolerate all religions but the Roman Catholic. The town is under the protection of the States General, but the king of Prussia took possession of it upon the demise of the last prince, and the States also claim it. Lat. 53, 5, N. Long. 7 26, E.

EMBOLI, AMPHIPOLIS, or CHRISTIPOLIS, a ruined town of Macedonia in European Turkey, on the river Strymon; anciently famous as being a colony of the Athenians. The second name is the oldest, the third it had from the Christians, and the first from the Turks, to whom it is subject. It is the see of an archbishop, 18 miles N. E. of Contensia. Lat. 41, 48, N. Long. 48, 20, E.

EMBRO, or LEMBRO, anciently Imbros, an island of the Archipelago in European Turkey, it is mountainous, and covered with woods, in which are wild beasts and wild game. To it belong four villages; one of which is of the same name as the island, and defended by a castle. Here was also a town of the same name, consecrated to Cabiri, and also to Mercury. See SAMONDRACHI.

EMBRUN. See AMBRUN in Dauphiny in France.

EMBS, a town in the county of Dietz and Wetteraw in Germany, famous for its baths.

EMERITA AUGUSTA, capital of the province of Lusitania, now Portugal, in the Roman times, situated upon the Anas, was built by a body of superannuated soldiers, to whom Augustus assigned a district in Lusitania; and hence this city took its name. We find this colony frequently mentioned in ancient Roman coins and inscriptions. Emerita at first appertained to the Turduli, according to Strabo, though afterwards it was ranked among the towns of the Vettones, as we learn from Prudentius.

EMERICK. See EMMERICK.

EMMERTINGEN, a large open town of Suabia in Germany. It lies near that of Hochberg.

EMESA, EMISA, or EMISSA, was a city of Syria Proper, placed by most of the ancient geographers on the Orontes, between Apamea and Laodicea Cabiosa. The emperor Heliogabalus was a native of it, as Evagrius informs us; on which account that mad emperor took it into his head to be made one of the priests and principal ministers of its temple. The emperor Constantius built a famous cathedral in it. It made a great figure during the reign of the Seleucidæ, and became an early episcopal see under that of Antioch. It was afterwards taken from the Mussulman Arabs by the Crusaders, in 1098, and retaken by Saladin about 100 years after. The Tartars mastered it about 1258; and were afterwards driven out of it by the Mussulman Mamelukes; and these at length by the Turks. It is now called Chems, and Aman or Haman.

EMLY, or AWN, a decayed town of Tipperary county, in the province of Munster, and kingdom of Ireland, near the river Glasfon. It was formerly the see of a bishop, and once a considerable populous city. It is six miles from Tipperary.

EMMA, a large rapid river of Berne in Switzerland, watering the valley called Emmethal. Its source is in the mountains of Brunik, near Unterwald, and running directly from S. to N. through Berne, in a course almost parallel, for a good way, with the Aar, falls into it below Solothurn with such violence, as to render its navigation hazardous.

EMMERGREEN, a village in Dorsetshire, with a fair on Tuesday before Holy-Thursday.

EMMERICK, or EMBRICK, a large Hans-town in the duchy of Cleve, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany, on the E. side of the Rhine, with a pretty good trade. It is subject to Brandenburg, has always a small garrison; but its fortifications are not so considerable as formerly.

The governor and magistrates, with many of the burghers, are Calvinists, and have one church; but the rest are in the possession of the Romanists. Here was till lately a Jesuits college for teaching of youth. It lies 10 miles N. E. of the city of Cleves. Lat. 52, 5, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

EMMETHAL, i. e. the valley of Emma, which river runs through it) a very wild country of Berne in Switzerland. In this district reside most of the Anabaptists of this canton, as they are not tolerated any where else in it. See EMMA.

EMPOLI, a neat small town in Tuscany, and middle division of Italy, on the Arno. It is the see of a bishop, suffragan to Florence, from which city it lies 20 miles to the W. Lat. 43, 26, N. Long. 11, 44, E.

EMS, a river of Germany, which rising in Paderborn, the S. E. division of Westphalia, runs W. through Ritberg; then winding on the N. passes through Tecklenburg and Munster, and continuing the same course through the county of Embden, a part of East Friesland, falls into the Dollart-bay, near the city of Embden.

ENBOURN, (East and West,) in Berkshire, near Newberry, are famous for the custom of the manor. On the death of a copyhold tenant, the widow is to have her free-bench in all his copyhold lands, Dum sola et casta fuerit; but if she commit incontinency, she forfeits her widow's estate; yet, after this, if she come into the next court held for the manor, riding backwards on a black ram, and say the following words, the steward is bound by the custom to admit her to her free-bench:

"Here I am, riding upon a black ram,

"Like a whore as I am;

"And for my crinum crancum,

"Have lost my bincum bancum;

"And for my tail's game,

"Am brought to this worldly shame;

"Wherefore, good Mr. Steward, let me have
"my lands again."

ENCHUYSEN, a town of North Holland, on the Zuyder-zee. It is strong by nature and art. The church steeple is extraordinary high, with a good new harbour within the city, and three parts of it surrounded by the sea. Here several ships are built; they have also a good herring-fishery, and trade to the Baltic, &c. by which, and refining of Brittany salt, the town flourishes. This was the first place that revolted from Spain, after taking of the Brill. It lies 10 miles S. E. of Hoorn. Lat. 52, 39, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

ENCOPING, or ENKIOPING, an antique town of Uplandia, in Sweden Proper. It lies in a fruitful ful country, on the Maler-lake, and near the confines of Westmannia. The number of inhabitants in it is 600, and has a pretty good trade. It was destroyed once by the Germans, and twice by fire. It holds the 45th rank in the general diet: and Dahlberg gives a view of it. It lies 24 miles from Upsal on the S. and 25 from Stockholm westward.

ENDER, is the most considerable of the many trading villages along the banks of Panier-Foule, in Guinea, and stands on the W. bank, 20 leagues from fort St. Lewis to N. E. Here the king of the Jolloiffs often resides.

ENDOR, mentioned II. Sam. xxviii. as the place of residence of a woman that had a familiar spirit, and to whom Saul applied to raise up Samuel, was a city of the half-tribe of Manassah, on the W. of Jordan. And Eusebius and Jerom tell us, that in their days there was a great town of that name near mount Tabor, about four miles to the S. of it. Which might very well be the same Endor.

ENFIELD, in Middlesex, 12 miles from London, is called in some old records Enfen, or Infen, from the fenny soil of some part of its parish so drained since, that, except the part called Enfield-Wash, it is now become good land. It was formerly noted for tanning of hides; had a royal palace in the reign of Henry VII. and the chace near it is a parcel of the duchy of Lancaster. In the center almost of the chace, are the ruins of an old house, which is said to have belonged to the earls of Essex. Here is a most sumptuous lodge for the ranger; and the skirts of the chace are stored with country seats for the citizens of London and sportmen. This chace was full of deer and all sorts of game, when king James I. resided at Theobalds; but in the civil wars was stripped both of the game and timber, and let out in farms. Yet after the Restoration it was laid open again; woods and groves were re-planted, and the whole chace stored with deer; but it is not, nor perhaps ever will be, what it was. The market is on Saturday, and the fair November 29. Here are several boarding-schools, one of which is a large old house, called Queen Elizabeth's, on Enfield-green, overagainst the church. An act of parliament has lately passed for enclosing great part of this chace.

ENGADINE, (Upper and Lower) in Germany, called Innthal, i. e. the valley of the Inn. It lies in the Grisons of Swisserland, and extends itself 15 or 16 leagues from S. to N. all along the river Inn from its source. It is separated from the Pergel and Bevio communities by the Italian Alps. Near Scamf and mount Cafanna, over which EGANO, (isle of,) on the coast of Sumatra, and Indian ocean, in Asia, about 20 leagues in the Offing. It may be seen about the distance of nine or 10 leagues. Though uninhabited, it is very level, and about three leagues in length.

ENGED, or ENYED, a well inhabited town of Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. Here is a gymnasium or academy of Reformed. In the neighbouring cornfields and mountains several Roman coins have been found.

ENGEDI, in the strong holds of which David took refuge, 1 Sam. xxiii. 29, &c. had anciently the name of Hazezon-tamar, as appears from Gen. xiv. 7. compared with 2 Chron. xx. 2. It was a city in the tribe of Judah, as appears from Joshua xv. 62. and not far from the Salt-sea, and in a wilderness or desolate country.

ENGELHOLM, a town of Scania, and South Gothland, in Sweden, not far from the sea or Cate-gate. It is so called either, says Busching, as the Angles (from whom was a branch of the English progenitors) came originally from hence, or its being built for the conveniency of their trade. It is under the jurisdiction of Helsingborg, from which it is only two miles on the N. People are very much incommoded by the flying sand here, but the land is gradually sown with oats, fit for sandy grounds, by which means it is much laid or fixed. This is the twentieth town in the general diet.

ENGELSTEIN, a church-village in the Scheft circle, in Natingia, and kingdom of Prussia; it is remarkable for its church, which stands in a thick wood, and the tokens of antiquity to be met with in it.

ENGERBEL, or INGUBEL, lies seven leagues from that called the Defart, in Guinea, where the king of the Jolloiffs has his palace, which consists in a pretty large number of huts, inclosed within a pallisadoe of reeds, in the midst of which is an open place shaded with trees, round which are built his hut, store-houses, &c. The door of the pallisadoe is usually guarded by five or six negroes, armed with sabres and hassagayes.

ENGERS, a town on the Rhine, and the capital of a neighbouring territory of its name, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, and electorate of Triers, in Germany. Here is a strong castle, and a noble bridge. It lies between Coblentz and Andernach, about nine miles N. of the former. Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 7, 22, E.

ENGHIEN, or ANGUIEN, by the Flemish called Edinghen, a city of Hainault, in the Austrian Low Countries. It stands in a valley, 20 miles S. W. of Brussels. In its neighbourhood king is the road into the county of Bormio, where there are lead-mines.

EGANO, (isle of,) on the coast of Sumatra, and Indian ocean, in Asia, about 20 leagues in the Offing. It may be seen about the distance of nine or 10 leagues. Though uninhabited, it is very level, and about three leagues in length.

ENGED, or ENYED, a well inhabited town of Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. Here is a gymnasium or academy of Reformed. In the neighbouring cornfields and mountains several Roman coins have been found.

ENGEDI, in the strong holds of which David took refuge, 1 Sam. xxiii. 29, &c. had anciently the name of Hazezon-tamar, as appears from Gen. xiv. 7. compared with 2 Chron. xx. 2. It was a city in the tribe of Judah, as appears from Joshua xv. 62. and not far from the Salt-sea, and in a wilderness or desolate country.

ENGELHOLM, a town of Scania, and South Gothland, in Sweden, not far from the sea or Cate-gate. It is so called either, says Busching, as the Angles (from whom was a branch of the English progenitors) came originally from hence, or its being built for the conveniency of their trade. It is under the jurisdiction of Helsingborg, from which it is only two miles on the N. People are very much incommoded by the flying sand here, but the land is gradually sown with oats, fit for sandy grounds, by which means it is much laid or fixed. This is the twentieth town in the general diet.

ENGELSTEIN, a church-village in the Sehest circle, in Natingia, and kingdom of Prussia; it is remarkable for its church, which stands in a thick wood, and the tokens of antiquity to be met with in it.

ENGERBEL, or INGUBEL, lies seven leagues from that called the Defart, in Guinea, where the king of the Jolloiffs has his palace, which consists in a pretty large number of huts, inclosed within a pallisadoe of reeds, in the midst of which is an open place shaded with trees, round which are built his hut, store-houses, &c. The door of the pallisadoe is usually guarded by five or six negroes, armed with fabres and hassagayes.

ENGERS, a town on the Rhine, and the capital of a neighbouring territory of its name, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, and electorate of Triers, in Germany. Here is a strong castle, and a noble bridge. It lies between Coblentz and Andernach, about nine miles N. of the former. Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 7, 22, E.

ENGHIEN, or ANGUIEN, by the Flemish called Edinghen, a city of Hainault, in the Austrian Low Countries. It stands in a valley, 20 miles S. W. of Brussels. In its neighbourhood king William III. having attacked marshal Luxemburg in 1692, who lay entrenched in the village of Steinkirk, from which latter the battle took its name, was repulsed by the French with considerable loss. Lat. 50, 36, N. Long. 3, 52, E.

ENGIA, corruptly, rather Oegina, which see; one of the Archipelago islands, in European Turkey. It has no harbour, but between it and Augestri, Douronifa, and Moni, the Venetian fleet often anchored in the Candian war. From the castle, which stands high, is a prospect quite round, particularly to the whole Attic and Morean shore. This island abounds in corn, cotton, honey, wax, and almonds. It is 30 miles in circuit, and the neighbouring gulph takes its first name from Engia, as it did anciently that of the river Saron; the former from a corruption of the sailors, here several shipwrecks happening.

ENGLAND, the S. Division of Great Britain. It is of a triangular form, surrounded by the Atlantic and German oceans on the E. S. and W. is parted on the N. from Scotland, the N. Division of Great Britain, by the Tweed, two other rivers and some mountains. The German ocean separates it from Germany, and also from both the Netherlands on the N. E. and is divided on the S. from France by the English Channel, the narrowest part of which between Dover and Calais, is called Pas de Calais, or the Straits of Calais, or those of Dover; on the W. it is separated from Ireland by St. George's Channel. It lies between lat. 49, deg. 55 min. and 55 deg. N. and between long. 2 deg. E. and 6 deg. W. being about 360 geographical miles from N. to S. and 300 from E. to W. in the southern parts, but hardly 100 in those of the northern.

England derives its name from the Angles, the ancient inhabitants of a small track of country of the same name; in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark, who in the 5th century came into Britain under the conduct of their neighbours on both sides of them; namely, the Saxons and Jutes, upon the invitation of the Britons and ancient inhabitants of this country, in order to assist them against the Picts and other northern invaders. But first getting a small settlement in the Isle of Sheppey, as a reward for their services, they liked the country so well, that, through various pretences, they quarrelled with their inviters, drove them into that mountainous part of England called Wales, and at length made themselves masters of the whole country, giving it the name of their former residence, Anglond, or England.

As England has had various divisions, under different forms of government, it is necessary to point out their extent, without which many things hereafter noticed would be very obscure.

The first inhabitants of Britain are allowed to have come from the neighbouring continent, chiefly France; and were a rude warlike people, who lived in hovels, painted their bodies, and covered themselves with skins of beasts. They were divided into separate tribes, governed by superiors; but our knowledge of them before the arrival of the Romans is defective and uncertain, because they committed nothing to writing, though it appears that they were not unacquainted with letters, for among other maxims of the Druids, there is one that forbids their mysteries to be written, a prohibition that was unnecessary where letters were unknown.

Britain became subject to the Romans about 45 years before Christ, when they found the country divided into the following 17 principalities.

The Romans having maintained their conquest by military force, Britain became a province to the Roman empire, when they gradually incorporated the flower of the British youth into their legions; their forces they divided into different parties which were placed at convenient stations all over the province; and the Roman general, for the time being, was supreme governor of the whole.

When they provinciated their conquest they divided it into,

I. BRITANNIA PRIMA,

Which was bounded on the S. by the English Channel, and on the N. by the Thames and Severn, Included - -	{ Danmonii, Durotrigæ, Belgæ, Atrebatii, Regni, Cantii.

--------------	--

II. BRITANNIA SECUNDA,

Was the same with that now called Wales,

Included - -	{ Ordovices, Dimetæ, Silures.
--------------	-------------------------------------

III. FLAVIA CÆSARIENSIS,

Which reached from the Thames to the Humber,

Included - -	{ Trinobantes, Debuni, Iceni, Catieuchlani, Coritani, Cornavii.
--------------	--

IV. MAXIMA CÆSARIENSIS,

Which reached from the Humber to the Tyne,

Included, - -	{ Brigantes, and part of Ottadini.

They had a fifth province named Valentia, which extended from the Tyne to Edinburgh, called Grimes-dike, and included part of Scotland and the remaining part of Ottadini.

During the sovereignty of the Romans in Britain, it is universally agreed, that they made many public roads, for the convenient march of their army as well as travellers. These were called by them consular, prætorian, and military ways; by these they could travel and cross the country from one city, colony, and station, to another. These they made as direct as the nature of the ground would admit of, upon stone and gravel, with great labour where the soil required it. Four of these are reckoned their grand roads, because they extended ended the length or breadth of what is now called England, and all the others terminated in them. The names by which three of them are now known, are Saxon, called streets, as Watling-street, Ermine-street, and Ickenild-street, the fourth is called Fosse, from the Roman method of making a causeway between ditches. Their directions were as follows:

WATLING-STREET.

This road goes S. to N. from the lands extremity at Richborough in Kent, through London to Tinmouth in Northumberland. By Watling-street, the Saxons without doubt meant the winding street, in contradistinction to the other three, which are as direct as the nature of the ground they pass through would admit. This street retains its name chiefly in Staffordshire, where it is generally called Street only; and so it is again from Atherston to High-crofts. In some places by the inhabitants it is called High-dike, High-ridge, Forty-foot-way, and Ridge-way. It is reckoned the finest causeway in England, if not in Europe, and is very firm in some counties, especially in Shropshire, Staffordshire, and part of Warwickshire.

ERMINE-STREET,

Leads from S. to E. and may be traced from Hampshire, through Surry, to London; from thence by Islington, to Hornsey, and when it has crossed Enfield-chace, it enters Hertfordshire at Northall-common, which it passes over, then by Newgate-street, and Berkhamsted, comes to Hertford, and leading through Braughing, Here-street, Barkway and Barley, keeps a straight course through Essex, Cambridgehire, Suffolk and Norfolk to its period at Yarmouth.

ICKENILD-STREET.

It goes from S. E. to S. W. beginning at Colchester in Essex, and goes westward to Barley in Hertfordshire, from thence to Royston, it divides the counties of Cambridge and Hertford. From Ickleford it passes by Tring, crosses Bucks and Oxfordshire, passes the Thames at Goring, and extends to the western part of England.

FOSSE-WAY.

Its course is from the S. W. to the N. E. leading from the sea-coast of Devonshire to Saltfleet upon the sea-coast of Lincolnshire. It comes in a direct line to Warwickshire, thence to Leicester town, and enters Nottinghamshire at Willoughby on the Wolds. It keeps a fort of parallel with the Trent till it comes to Newark, and there upon the river's eastern branch has an inosculation with it. It proceeds then to Lincoln; and from thence, by Louth, to Saltfleet. There are none of the Prætorian ways more direct than this; nor any that have so evident remains of its pristine state, though of 1400 years duration.

The remains of many Roman camps are discernable all over England. Their situations are generally so well chosen, and their fortifications appear to have been so compleat, that there is some reason to believe that they were the constant habitations of the Roman soldiers; though it is certain from the Bath and tessellated pavements that have been found in different parts, that their chief officers and magistrates lived in towns and cities. Roman walls have frequently been discovered in England; and perhaps upon the borders of Wales, many remains of their fortifications and castles are blended with those of a later date; and it is difficult even for the most accomplished architect to pronounce that some buildings are not entirely Roman; but the most amazing monument of the Roman power in England, is the wall of Severus, commonly called the Picts Wall, which passed through Northumberland and Cumberland, beginning at Tinmouth, and ending at Solway frith, 80 miles in length.

Agreeable to the Itinerary of Antoninus, the Roman roads took the following directions; the Roman name of each is shewn in the first column of this table, the modern name in the second, and in the third the distances from each place.

Britain remained under the Roman government till 426, when they relinquished the possession, and the emperor Honorius renounced his sovereignty of the island, and released the Britons from their allegiance.

When the emperor's troops abandoned Britain, the country being left in a defenceless state, it was invaded by the Scots, who were so rapacious and cruel, that the inhabitants invited over the Saxons to deliver them from intolerable oppression, and repulse the invaders; proposing as a reward, to give them the little isle of Thanet on the coast of Kent. The Saxon generals soon became petty sovereigns of different districts, and divided the S. part of the island a third time into seven distinct kingdoms named Kent, Southsex, East-Angles, Westsex, Northumberland, Eastsex, and Mercia.

In this division the Roman division of Britannia Secunda, or Wales, was not included, as thither the Ancient Britons had fled, and defended themselves against their Saxon invaders.

The different kingdoms of this Heptarchy was subdivided into several portions, each containing a certain number of hydes, and each of these hydes was under the government of an earldorman or earl.

Such was the state of Britain, whose petty sovereigns were perpetually committing hostilities against each other, till about the year 823, when Egbert, king of the West Saxons, became the sole sovereign of all England.

About the year 889, Alfred, a successor of Egbert, as sovereign of the whole Heptarchy, rendered the dimensions of these districts more exact, and divided England into 32 counties or shires, the present names of which, and their relation both to the British principalities, and the Saxon Heptarchy, will appear by the following table.

Shropshire, 32. Staffordshire.	Coritani. Cattiuechlani, who had also part of Hertfordshire. Dobuni. Silures, who had also part of Wales. Cornavii.

These 32 counties were increased to 40, by those afterwards named Durham and Lancashire, before included in Yorkshire; Cornwall was also included in Devonshire, and Rutland in Northamptonshire; Monmouthshire, which was deemed a part of Wales; and Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Cumberland, were then supposed to have been subject to the Scots. These 40, with the addition of 12 into which Wales was afterwards divided, make the present number 52.

Alfred subdivided each county into trethings or trithings (of which riding is a corruption,) hundreds, and tythings or decannaries. The trething was a third part of a county; the hundred was a district containing an hundred families; and the tything a district that contained 10 families.

The exact time of the division of Wales into counties is very obscure; Caermarthenshire, Glamorganshire, Pembrokehire, Cardiganshire, Flintshire, Caernarvonshire, Anglesea, and Merionethshire, appear to have been of ancient date; in the time of Edward I. to these the following four were added by act of parliament, in the reign of Henry VIII. viz. Radnorshire, Brecknockshire, Montgomeryshire, and Denbighshire.

The first division of Wales, that we have any authentic records of was made about 870, when Roderick, king of Wales, divided it among his three sons, into three districts, which were called kingdoms, and distinguished by the names of South Wales, Powis-land, and North Wales. This division gave rise to many wars, in which the kingdom of Powis-land, was divided among the conquerors, and annexed partly to South Wales, and the remainder to North Wales; divisions which subsist even to this time.

South Wales contains Cardiganshire, Pembrokehire, Caermarthenshire, Glamorganshire, Brecknockshire, and Radnorshire; and North Wales contains Flintshire, Caernarvonshire, Montgomeryshire, Merionethshire, Denbighshire, and the Isle of Anglesea, which is also a county.

During the time of the Saxons, that form of government was established, which with some circumstantial variations, has continued ever since. To them indeed, we are indebted for the inestimable privilege of being tried by a jury; and from them also we have the origin of our parliament.

After the Norman conquest many alterations were made from time to time in the form of government; and the manner in which it was administered.

Wales continued under the government of its own princes and laws till 1282, when their last sovereign lost both his life and principality, to Edward I. who created his infant son prince of Wales, and ever since the eldest sons of the kings of England, have always had that title. Since the Norman conquest, England has been divided into six circuits, each containing a certain number of counties; two judges are for each circuit, which they visit twice each year, for the administering justice to the subjects, who are at a distance from the capital. These circuits and counties are as follows:

I. HOME CIRCUIT.

Counties in the following order.	Where held, and how long the journey from London.
Hertford, —	Hertford, 21.
Essex, —	Chelmsford, 53.
Surry, —	Guildford, 112, but sometimes at Kingston.
Suffex, —	Horsham, 137, sometimes at Lewes, and sometimes at Grinstead.
Kent, —	Maidstone, 190.

II. NORFOLK CIRCUIT.

Bucks, —	Buckingham, 57, sometimes at Aylesbury.
Bedford, —	Bedford, 85.
Huntingdon, —	Huntingdon, 106.
Cambridge, —	Cambridge, 121.
Suffolk, —	Bury St. Edmund's, 149.
Norfolk, —	Norwich, 190, sometimes at Thetford.

III. OXFORD CIRCUIT.

The Lent affizes sometimes begin at Reading and end at Worcester.

Worcester, —	Worcester, 111.
Stafford, —	Stafford, 158.
Shropshire, —	Shrewsbury, 191.
Hereford, —	Hereford, 246.
Monmouth, —	Monmouth, 264.
Gloucester, —	Gloucester, 291.

Rutland, —	Okeham, 96.
Lincoln, —	Lincoln, 153.
Nottingham, —	Nottingham, 192.
Derby, —	Derby, 208.
Leicester, —	Leicester, 235.
Warwick, —	Coventry, 259, Warwick, 269.
Northampton, —	Northampton, 300.

V. NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

The Lent affizes only extend to York and Lancaster. The Autumn affizes extend to Durham, Newcastle, Carlisle, and Appleby, and is termed the long circuit.

York, —	York, 197.
Durham, —	Durham, 266.
Northumberland, —	Newcastle, 280.
Cumberland, —	Carlisle, 336.
Westmoreland, —	Appleby, 368.
Lancashire, —	Lancaster, 411.

VI. WESTERN CIRCUIT.

Hants, —	Winchester, 64.
Wilts, —	Salisbury, 88.
Dorset, —	Dorchester, 126.
Devon, —	Exeter, 179.
Cornwall, —	Bodmin, 241, but sometimes at Launceston, and sometimes at Truro.
Somerfet. —	Bridgewater, 340, sometimes at Wells, sometimes at Taunton. Bristol, 503.

Middlesex and Cheshire are not included in the above, the first being the seat of the supreme courts of justice, and the latter a county palatine. Besides Cheshire, there are other counties palatine, viz. Lancaster, Durham and Ely, but these two are included in the circuits. There is indeed, a court of chancery in Lancaster and Durham; with a chancellor, and there yet remains a court of exchequer at Chester, of a mixed kind, of which the chamberlain of Chester is judge.

consisting of certain districts, to which the liberties and jurisdictions peculiar to a county have been granted by charters; thus the city of London is a county distinct from Middlesex: and the cities of York, Bristol, Exeter, Chester, Norwich, Worcester, &c. are counties of themselves distinct from those in which they lie.

The sovereigns of England, ever since the reign of Henry VIII. have been called in all public writs, the supreme head of the church; but this title conveys no spiritual meaning, as it only denotes the regal power to prevent any ecclesiastical differences, by substituting the King in place of the Pope, with regard to temporalities, and the internal œconomy of the church.

The church of England, under the monarchical power over it, is governed by two archbishops and 24 bishops, besides the bishop of Sodor and Man, who does not sit in the house of peers, not being possessed of an English barony. The names of the dioceses, and the counties comprehended in the provinces of Canterbury and York, together with their valuation in the king's books of each diocese, and the number of parishes and appropriated benefices, including those in the hands of lay-persons, and are properly impropriations, will appear by the following table:

The Biſhop of Sodor and Man is reputed a ſuffragan to the See of York.

The

The considerable difference in the soil of the counties of England and Wales does not arise so much from the nature of the ground, as from the progress which the inhabitants have made in cultivation, which of late years has been carried to a much greater degree of perfection than perhaps any other country in Europe; so that if no unkindly season happens, England produces not only sufficient corn to maintain her own inhabitants, but enables her to admit for exportation such vast quantities, as return immense sums. No nation in the world excels England in the production of the garden; the single instance of London and its neighbourhood, though inhabited by above 1,000,000 persons, who are plentifully supplied with all kinds of roots, fruits, and kitchen stuff, from grounds only 12 miles distant, is sufficient to convince. The soil, indeed, seems particularly adapted for raising timber, as may be concluded from the plantations of trees round the houses of some of our noblemen and gentlemen, and even of peasants, which are both delightful and astonishing.

As to the air, in many places it is certainly loaded with vapours, wafted from the adjacent seas, but they are ventilated by winds and storms; so that England is to foreigners and people of delicate constitutions, more disagreeable than unhealthy. Indeed the seasons are so uncertain, that they admit of no description; spring, summer, autumn, and winter succeed each other, but in what month their different appearances take place is very uncertain. The natives sometimes experience all the four seasons within the compass of one day; cold, temperate, hot, and mild weather; notwithstanding which, it is not, as in many other countries, attended with famine, and very seldom with scarcity.

The champaign parts of England are generally supplied with excellent springs, many of which contain some mineral impregnation. The constitutions of the natives, and the various diseases to which they are liable, have rendered them extremely inquisitive after salubrious waters for the recovery and preservation of their health; so that England contains as many mineral wells, of known efficacy, as perhaps any country in Europe.

No nation in the universe can equal the cultivated parts of England, where the industry of the inhabitants is, and has been such, as to supply the deficiency of those favours which nature has so lavishly bestowed on some foreign climates, and in many respects even to exceed them. The most barren spots are not without their verdure; and upon the whole, it may be asserted, that no part of Europe equals England in the beauty of its prospects, or the opulence of its inhabitants. It contains but few mountains; the most noted are, the Peak in Derbyshire, the Endle in Lancashire, the Wolds in Yorkshire, the Cheviot-hills on the borders of Scotland, the Chiltern in Bucks, Malvern in Worcestershire, Cotswold in Gloucestershire, the Wrekin in Shropshire; with those of Plinlimmon, Penmanmeaur, and Snowden in Wales. Indeed Wales in general may be reckoned mountainous. The rivers in England add greatly to its beauty and opulence, each of which is spoken of in the county where it runs. The lakes of England are but few; though history, and indeed, some places, from the face of the country, shew, that meres and fens have been more frequent in England than at present, till drained, and converted into arable land by industry. The chief lakes now remaining are; Soham-mere, Whittlesea-mere, and Ramsey-mere, in Cambridgeshire; all which, in a rainy season, have covered 40 or 50 miles in circumference. Winander-mere lies in Westmoreland; and some small lakes in Lancashire are named Derwent-waters.

Formerly there were 69 forests in England, which are now reduced to those only of Windsor, New-forest, Sherwood, and the forest of Dean. In ancient times here were large woods or forests of chefnut-trees, whose timber is of great duration in building.

Among the minerals, the tin mines of Cornwall are the most considerable, where at least 100,000 miners are constantly employed. Cheshire and Northumberland yield allum and salt-pits. Marble in Derbyshire and Devonshire; free-stone in several counties; pit and sea-coal in Northumberland and Durham, &c. Nothing can be said with any certainty concerning the quantities of wheat, barley, rye, peas, beans, vetches, oats, and other horse grain growing in the kingdom, which are excellent of their kind. Honey and saffron are natives of the kingdom: and it is needless to mention in what plenty the most excellent fruits, apples, pears, plumbs, cherries, peaches, &c. grow here, where the different fruits of all the world are introduced and cultivated to perfection; and the kitchen gardens abound with all sorts of greens, roots, and sallads; nor must hops be forgot.

In nothing have the English been more successful than in the cultivation of clover, cinquefoil, trefoil, saintfoin, lucern, and other grasses for the soil. The English oxen are large and fat, and their meat preferred for exportation to any other whatever. The English horses are generally esteemed the best of any in the world, whether regarded for their spirit, strength, swiftness, or docility; and by the methods taken for improving the breed, they have now united all the qualities and beauties of the Indian, Persian, Arabian, Spanish, and other foreign horses.

The English sheep are of two kinds, one valuable for their fleece, the other for their flesh. The former are very large, and constitute the original staple commodity of England; and it is said that there are 12,000,000 of fleeces shorn annually, which at two shillings per fleece, make 1,200,000*l*. The other kind of sheep are fed upon the downs, such as Bansted, Bagshot-heath, and Devonshire, whose flavour and sweetness is little inferior to venison. The English mastiffs and bull-dogs are the strongest and fiercest of the canine species in the world; but degenerate when carried into foreign climates; which is also observed of the English game-cocks. Poultry are nearly the same in England as in other countries; as are also the different sorts of wild-fowl; and a great variety of small birds, particularly nightingales and canary-birds, which breed in England. The wheat-ear is by many preferred to the ortolon, for the delicacy of its flavour and flesh, and is peculiar to England. Few countries are better supplied with river, pond, and sea fish. As to reptiles and insects, England is nearly on an equality with the rest of Europe.

It is in some degree presumptuous to pretend to ascertain the number of inhabitants in England and Wales, though they are by some supposed to be 7,000,000. The fallibility of political calculations appears in a very striking light, with regard to London, because it is impossible to know the exact number of births and burials, as so considerable a number are not included within the limits of the bills of mortality.

As to the customs of the English, they have, from the beginning of the present century, undergone an almost total alteration. Their ancient hospitality subsists but in very few places, or is revived only upon electioneering occasions. Many of their favourite diversions are now disused, such as boxing and prize-fighting, which were frequent in England, and were equally as inhuman as the shows of the gladiators at Rome; and all places of public diversions, excepting the theatres royal, are regulated by acts of parliament. At present the English bid fair to be the dictators of dress to the French themselves, at least with regard to elegance, neatness, and richness.

The antiquities of England are numerous, and are situated in different counties, consisting either of British, Roman, Saxon, Danish, or Norman origin. The chief British antiquity is that called Stonehenge in Wiltshire, a place of druidical worship; indeed there are some of the same kind in Cumberland, Oxfordshire, Cornwall, Devonshire, &c. The chief Roman antiquities are, the watch-tower at Dover, the military roads, &c. whose vestiges are numerous. The remains of many Roman encampments are discernable all over England; a critical account of which is far too extensive for this work.

The Saxon antiquities consist chiefly in ecclesiastical buildings and places of security, and are to be met with in every county in the kingdom, though they are not easily to be distinguished from the Norman. The Danish erections in England are hardly discernable from the Saxon. The form of their camps are round, as well as their towers; but their forts are square. As to the Anglo-Norman monuments, they are so common, that they scarcely deserve the name of curiosities.

The natural curiosities in England are various; among which are several medicinal springs; to describe them would far exceed the limits prescribed us. They have been analysed with great accuracy and judgment by several learned naturalists, who, as their interest or inclination prompted them, have not been sparing in recommending their salubrious qualities; the chief of which lie in Somersetshire, Yorkshire, Kent, Surry, and Middlesex. Derbyshire is, indeed, celebrated for its many natural curiosities as well chalybeate waters.

This country is, of all others, the most proper for trade, as well from its situation as an island, as from its constitution, natural products, and considerable manufactures. For exportation it produces many of the most substantial and necessary commodities, as butter, cheese, corn, cattle, wool, iron, lead, tin, copper, leather, copperas, alum, pit-coal, saffron, &c. Our horses are the most serviceable in the world, and highly valued by all nations. With our beef, mutton, pork, poultry, and biscuit, we victual not only our own fleets, but many foreigners. Prodigious, and almost incredible, is the value of our manufactured iron and other goods from hence exported; indeed there is scarce a manufacture in Europe but what is brought to great perfection in England. The woollen manufacture is the most considerable, which far exceeds in goodness and quantity that of any other nation. Hardware is another capital article, which by foreign nations is held in great esteem.

With regard to the general account of the balance of the foreign trade of England, the exports have been computed at 7,000,000*l*. sterling, and its imports at 5,000,000*l*. of which above 1,000,000*l*. is re-exported; so that it gains annually 3,000,000*l*. in trade; but this is a point in which the most able and experienced merchants and calculators differ.

Yet our foreign trade does not amount to one-sixth part of the inland; the annual produce of the natural products and manufactures of England amounting to above 42,000,000.

The

The gold and silver of England is received from Portugal, Spain, Jamaica, the American colonies, and Africa; but great part of this gold and silver we export to Holland and the East Indies; and it is supposed that two-thirds of all the foreign traffic of England is carried on in the port of London.

We shall conclude this account of our trade with the following comparative view of the shipping belonging to the several states of Europe, supposing they are divided into 20 parts:

ENGLAND, (New) lately the most flourishing and most powerful colony the British nation had in America. It is bounded by the N. E. by Nova-Scotia, on the E. and S. by the Atlantic ocean, on the W. by New-York, and on the N. and N. W. by Canada. It is 450 miles long, and 190 broad. It lies between lat. 41 and 46, and long. 67 and 74.

Though New-England is situated almost 10 degrees nearer the sun than we are in England, yet the winter begins earlier, lasts longer, and is incomparably more severe than it is with us. The summer again is extremely hot, and more fervently so than in places which lie under the same parallels in Europe. However, both the heat and cold are now far more moderate, and the constitution of the air, in all respects, far better than at the first settlement. The clearing away of the woods, and opening the ground every where, has, by giving a free passage to the air, carried off those noxious vapours which were so prejudicial to the health of the first inhabitants. The temperament of the sky is generally, both in summer and winter, very steady and serene. Two months frequently pass without the appearance of a cloud. Their rains are heavy, and soon over.

The climate of New-England, compared with that of Virginia, is as the climate of South Britain is to that of North Britain. New-England being, as has been said, nearer to the equinoctial line than the old, their days and nights are consequently more equal. The sun rises at Boston, on the longest day, June 11th, 26 minutes after four in the morning, and sets at 34 minutes after seven in the evening. And on December 13, which is the shortest day, it rises at 35 minutes after seven in the morning, and sets at 27 minutes after four in the afternoon. So that the longest day in New-England is about 15 hours, and the shortest about nine.

This country, when first visited by the English, was one great forest, the Indians having cleared a small spot here and there for corn; but every three or four miles our countrymen found some fruitful valleys and brooks. The land next the sea is generally low, and in some parts marshy; but further up it rises into hills; and on the N. E. it is rocky and mountainous. About Massachusetts-Bay the soil is as fat and black as any part of England; and the first planters found the grass in the valleys very rank for want of cutting. But the uplands are not so fruitful, being mostly a gravelly and sandy soil, inclining to a clay.

Few countries are better watered with springs, rivers, and lakes, though the latter are not so large as those to the N. and W. Of its rivers, which all abound with fish, the Connecticut, Thames, Narraganset, Pantucket, Pigguaquet, Concord, Patuxet, Merrimack, Piscataqua, Sawko, Casco, Kennebeck, and Penobscot, are the largest.

To the conveniency of so many fine rivers, the number of large populous towns in this country is justly ascribed: and in the tracts between the rivers are so many brooks and springs, that there is hardly a place but fresh water may be had, by sinking a well within 10 or 12 feet of the surface, and such water as is generally good.

The most remarkable capes and points from S. to N. are Penaquid and Small points, Cape Elizabeth, Black Point, Bopus and Nidduk, or Bald-head capes, York Nubbles, Lock's Point, Great Boar's-head, Pigeon-hill, Cape Anne, Nahant, Pulein's, Alderton, Marshfield, Gurnet, Monument, and Sandy Points, Muarray's-cliffs, Sandy, Belingsgate, and Race Points, Cape Cod, Head of Pamet, Cape Malabar or Sandy Point, Gooseberry Neck, Ninigret, Quakhoragok, Watch, Black, Pipe-staves, and Hemunaflet Points, Sachem's Head, South, Long-Neck, and Elizabeth Points, and Lion's Tongue; also Cape Poge, and Gay-Head, in Martha's Vineyard. Bays chiefly to be noted are, Penobscot, Kennebek, Casco, Sawko, Wells, the great bay of Massachusetts, Cape-cod-bay, (including Plymouth bay), Buzzard's, and Narraganset bay; to which may be added the Devil's Belt, or Long-Island Sound, between that island and Connecticut, and Winipissioet pond, in New-Hampshire. The coves and inferior bays are, Merrymeeting, Mussequoif, and Harrafekket bays, Broad-cove, Exeter, and Little bays, Sandycove, Nabant, Oyster-river, Falmouth, and Nasky-tukket bays, Clarke's Cove, Nahantik, Guildford, and and Fairfield bays, Tarpaulin and Homes's Coves in Martha's-Vinyard island, and Tarpaulin-cove in Nashawn-island (one of those called Elizabeth). Its principal harbours are, Winter, Piscataqua, Cape Anne, Boston, Konohasset, Scituate, Yarmouth, Slokum's, New-haven, Ship, and Old Town (in Martha's-Vinyard island).

The soil of New-England is various, but best as you approach the southward. It affords excellent meadows in the low grounds, and very good pasture almost every where. They commonly allot at the rate of two acres for the maintenance of a cow. The meadows which they reckon the best, yield about a ton of hay each acre. Some produce two tons, but then the hay is rank and four. This country is not very favourable to any of the European kinds of grain.

The wheat is subject to be blasted; the barley is an hungry grain; and the oats are lean and chaffy; but the Indian corn, called maize, which makes the common food of the lowest sort of people, flourishes here.

About six quarts of seed is sufficient for an acre, which, at a medium, produces about 50 bushels. The New-England people not only make bread of this grain, but they malt and brew it into a beer, which is not despicable. The greater part of their beer, however, is made of molasses hopped, with the addition, sometimes, of the tops of the spruce-fir infused.

They raise a large quantity of flax; and have made essays upon hemp, which have been far from unsuccessful.

They have great plenty of all sorts of roots, as turnips, parsneps, carrots, radishes much larger and richer than ours, though their seeds come originally from hence; store of onions, cucumbers, and pumpions. But the seed of the water melons and squashes, which grow here in great plenty, is brought from Portugal, to which the traders here have long sent great quantities of fish.

They had a variety of fruits of their own growth, before the English arrived here, particularly grapes, currents, strawberries, raspberries, huckleberries, whitethorn-haws as big as our cherries, chestnuts, walnuts, small nuts, filberts, and many more; as also sorrel, water-creffes, savory, and the like salad and pot-herbs; besides, others for physic, and several sorts of pulse, but especially kidney-beans; and without doubt those vegetables have been since improved. The peaches here are large, all standard; and the fruit better than ours; and they commonly bear in three years from the stone. They have also great plenty of apples, with which they make large quantities of cider; so that, in 1721, at a village near Boston, of about 40 houses, they made near 3000 barrels; and some of their apple-trees yield six or seven barrels, at the rate of eight or nine bushels to the barrel. Here was a pearmain-tree, which, a foot from the ground, measured 10 feet four inches round, bore 38 bushels of fine fruit.

Their horned cattle are very numerous, and some of them very large. Oxen have been killed there of 1800 weight. They have also great numbers of hogs, and those excellent; and some so large as to weigh 25 score. They have besides a breed of small horses, which are extremely hardy. They pace naturally, though in no very graceful or easy manner; but with such swiftness, and for so long a continuance, as must appear almost incredible to those who have not experienced it. They have a great number of sheep too, and of a good kind. The wool is of a staple sufficiently long; but it is not so fine as that of Old England. They, however, manufacture a great deal of it successfully. Cloths are made of it, of as close and firm a contexture, though not so fine, as our best drabs, being thick, and superior for the ordinary wear of country people to any thing we make in England.

There are in many parts mines of iron ore, and some of copper; notwithstanding which, most of the iron used there is brought from the more southern provinces in pigs; and none of the copper-mines have hitherto been worked. They have great quantities of bog-iron, which is used for cast metal, and much esteemed.

The people, by their being generally freeholders, and by their form of government, have a very free, bold, and republican spirit. In no part of the world are the ordinary so independent, or possess so many of the conveniences of life. They are used from their infancy to the exercise of arms; and they have a militia, which, as such, is by no means contemptible, and in several skirmishes lately have proved themselves good soldiers. This too, is much the best proped of any of our colonies upon the continent. It is judged that the four provinces it comprises, namely, Massachusetts-bay, Connecticut, Rhode-Island, and New-Hampshire, contain upwards of 600,000 souls. These four governments are confederated for their common defence. The most considerable of them, for riches and number of people, being 200,000 of the latter, though not for extent of territory, is Massachusetts-bay.

Though in all the provinces of New-England are large towns, which formerly carried on a considerable trade, the chief one was Boston, the capital tal of Massachusetts-bay, and till lately the first city of New-England, and of all North America. See BOSTON.

For the towns of New-England, see the different provinces, viz. NEW-HAMPSHIRE, YORK, MASSACHUSETTS-BAY, RHODE-ISLAND, &c.

We derive our right in America from the discovery of Sebastian Cabot, who first made the N. American continent in 1497. It was, in general, called then Newfoundland, a name which is now appropriated to an island on its N. E. coast. It was a long time before we made any attempt to settle in this country, Sir Walter Raleigh shewed the way, by planting a colony in the southern part, which he called Virginia.

Early in the reign of king James I. a colony established itself at a place which they called New Plymouth. They were but few in number: near half of them perished by the scurvy, by want and the severity of the climate. But those who survived, not dispirited with their losses, nor with the hardships they were still to endure, and finding themselves out of the reach of the spiritual arm, reduced this savage country to yield them a tolerable livelihood, and by degrees a comfortable subsistence.

This little settlement was made in the year 1621. Several of their brethren in England took the same methods, whereby the colony of Puritans insensibly increased; but they did not extend themselves much beyond New Plymouth. In 1629 the colony began to flourish, so that they soon became a considerable people. By the close of the ensuing year they had built four towns, Salem, Dorchester, Charles-town, and Boston.

Those who found themselves uneasy upon a religious account in England, and several on account of the then profitable trade of furs and skins, and for the sake of the fisheries, were invited to settle in New England. But this colony received its principal assistance from the discontent of several great men of the Puritan party, who were its protectors, and who entertained a design of settling among them in New England, if they should fail in the measures they were pursuing for establishing the liberty, and reforming the religion, of their mother-country. They solicited for grants in New England, and were at a great expence in settling of them. Amongst these patentees we see the lord Brook, the lord Say and Sele, the Pelhams, the Hampdens, and the Pym. And Sir Matthew Boynton, Sir William Constable, Sir Arthur Haslerig, and Oliver Cromwell, were actually upon the point of embarking for New England, when archbishop Laud obtained an order for putting a stop to these emigrations.

That part of New England called Massachusetts-Bay had now settlements very thick all along the sea-shore. Some slips from these were planted in the province of York and New Hampshire, being torn from the original stock by that religious violence which was the chief characteristic of the first settlers in New England. The patentees last mentioned settled upon the river Connecticut, and established a separate and independent government there; some persons before that having fixed themselves upon the borders of this river, who fled from the tyranny of the Plymouth and Massachusetts colonies.

For a considerable time the people of New England had hardly any regular form of government. By their charter they were empowered to establish such order, and make such laws, as they pleased, provided they were not contrary to the laws of England; a point not easily settled, as they who composed the new colonies were of a contracted way of thinking, and most violent enthusiasts. They adopted the books of Moses as the law of the land; but the first laws grounded upon these have since fallen into disuse.

As to religion, it was, as has been said, the Puritan. And as soon as they found themselves at liberty in America, they fell into a way very little different from the independent mode. Some of these people settled themselves to the southward, near Cape Cod, where they formed a new government upon their own principles, and built a town, which they called Providence. This has since made the fourth and smallest, but not the worst inhabited, of all the New-England governments, called Rhode-Island, from an island of that name forming part of it.

The British and Indian commodities annually imported into this colony, till the commencement of the present troubles, were estimated at nearly 395,000*l.* and the exports to Great Britain at 370,000*l.* but their ship-building and fishery trade was on the decline.

In their wars with the Indians the people of New England shewed very little conduct: and though they prevailed in the end, in a manner, to the extirpation of that race of people, yet the Indians had always great advantages in the beginning; and the measures of the English to oppose them were, for the most part, injudiciously taken. Their manner, too, of treating them in the beginning was so indiscreet, as to provoke them as much to those wars as the French influence has done since that time.

ENGLISH-HARBOUR, one of the ports of the island of Antigua, in the West-Indies. It is the best port in the island, and is situated on the S. side; and at a great expence has been rendered fit to receive the largest ships of war, who find there a dock yard with stores and all the materials for repairing and careening. It is but a small distance from the town and harbour of Falmouth.

ENGSON, a considerable domain or estate, with a beautiful castle of Westmannia, in Sweden Proper. It lies upon an island in the Maler-lake.

ENGYUM, anciently a city of Sicily, situate near Mount Maurus, near the springs of Alefus. Cicero speaks of it as one of the most considerable of the island. It was founded by the Cretans, and celebrated for a temple dedicated to the goddesses stiled the Mothers.

ENKIOPING. See ENCOPING.

ENNA, HENNA, now Castro Giovanna, an ancient municipal city of the Val di Noto, in the island of Sicily, and Lower Division of Italy. It is particularly famous among the mythologists for the rape of Proserpine or Libera. It lies near the heart of the isle, upon a hill N. W. of lake Pergus, with a spacious plain much higher than it, difficult of access, and full of sweet springs, &c. The country about Enna is beautifully interspersed with fields, enamelled with flowers, lakes, rivers, springs, &c. Near it, and facing the N. point, is a cavern, from which Pluto is said to have come out in his car, and carried off Proserpine; after which the neighbouring fields were turned into a lake.

ENNIED, or ENGUEDINE, in Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary, by the Romans called Annium, from a cauleway leading towards it by one Annius, a captain of one of the cohorts. Some fragments of it are still remaining, besides other antiquities which are frequently found hereabouts. Ennied has besides a fine college.

ENNIS, or ENNIS-OWIN, the shire town of the county of Clare or Thomond, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It is the best place in it, has a market, and sends members to the Irish parliament, and stands near a lake formed by the river Shannon.

ENNIS-CORTHY, INIS-CORTHY, a town in the county of Wexford, and province of Leinster, in Ireland; at the confines of Urry and Slany. It sends deputies to parliament. It lies eight miles from Fernes.

ENNIS-KILLING, or INIS-KILLING, the most considerable town in the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ireland. It lies on an island, between two lakes, and is defended by a fort, and sends two members to parliament. Its inhabitants distinguished themselves in two obstinate defences; the first against queen Elizabeth's Protestant army in 1595; and the second against king James's popish army in 1689. It lies 24 miles E. of Ballyshannon.

ENNISTEOGUE, or IRISHTEAGUE, a town in the county of Kilkenny, and province of Leinster, in Ireland, on the river Nuse. It was walled in 1649, after Cromwell took it. It lies four miles from Thomas-town.

ENON. John iii. 23. we read that John was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, because there was much water there. Indeed, Enon imports the same as a place of springs; but the only mention we have of it in scripture is as quoted, and that it was situate near Salim; and the situation of this place is even now uncertain, unless it be the same with Shalem, or Salem; a city of Shechem, mentioned Gen. xxxiii. 18. or else the same with Shalim, or Salim, mentioned 1 Sam. ix. 4.

ENONTEKIS, meeting-place of, is a chapel of Juckasjerfwil pastorate, in Tornea Lapmark, and Lapland, in Sweden. It lies 24 miles towards the N. of it. Since 1744, here has been a school, also a bailiwick and court-house, with a market-place, where the burghers of Tornea trade; which latter town is 40 miles off. This parish consists of three villages, namely, Raunula, containing 45 Lap-dwellings, Peldojerf 11, and Sundawra 13, which pay tribute only to Sweden, besides 11 newly erected villages.

ENS, in Latin, Anasium, or Civitas Ensium, a strong well-built city of Upper Austria, in Germany, upon the river of its own name, which two miles N. falls into the Danube. It stands on the site of the ancient Lauriacum, before is demolition by the Huns in 903, some vestige of its name continued in the village of Laurich, now Larch, formerly reaching from the Danube to St. Florian's monastery, but now quite without the S. wall of it. It lies about 78 miles W. of Vienna. Lat. 48, 25, N. Long. 14, 32, E.

ENS, (river of,) naturally divides Austria into two parts. All the right-side of that river, towards Hungary, is called Lower Austria, or the country below the Ens; and that on the left-side of it, towards Bavaria, is called Upper Austria, or the country above the Ens.

ENISSHEIM, (lordship of,) in Upper Alsace, now belonging to France.

Of the same name is a fine town upon the Ill; but neither large nor rich. Here is a college. It lies 47 miles S. of Strasburg. Lat. 47, 49, N. Long. 7. 46, E.

ENTECLA, a river in Liguria, Italy, having its rise in the Appennines, not full 10 miles from Genoa, and falls into the Mediterranean, on the E. coast of Genoa.

ENTRADAS, a town of Alentejo, a province of Portugal, upon the river Corbos, containing between 5 and 600 inhabitants.

ENTRAIGUES, a town and county of Guyenne Proper, in France, not far from the confluence of the Lot and Truyere.

ENTRE DOURO é MINHO, the outermost province of Portugal, towards the N. It has its name from its situation between the rivers Douro and Minho. The Minho, anciently Minius, lies to the N. dividing it from Galicia in Spain; and the Duero or Douro (Durius,) to the S. which parts it from Beira. It has the Atlantic ocean on the W. and on the E. it is bounded by a ridge of mountains, which separates it from the province of Tras los Montes, or that on the other side of the hills. Its extent from N. to S. is said to be 18 Portuguese miles, and from W. to E. 12. It lies between lat. 41, and 42 N. and long. 8, W. being not only very fruitful; but its rivers, which discharge themselves into the sea, and its good harbours, the principal of which are Porto and Vianna, are likewise a great furtherance to the trade of this province: for which reason it contains two cities, Braga and Porto, 26 towns, and other lesser districts; so that, in proportion to its largeness, it is the best inhabited of all among the Portuguese provinces. It contains two cathedrals; namely, Braga and Porto, the former an archbishopric, five collegiate churches, as Guimaraens, Barcellos, Cedofeita, Valença do Minho, and Vianna; a great number of abbies, cloisters, and convents, which are mostly rich, and 963 parishes, the number of souls in which in the year 1732 was 432,372.

Among the commendaries of the order of Malta, is Balley da Leça, particularly to be remarked. The province is divided into six jurisdictions; three of which, comprehending the crown-lands, are called Correçoens; namely, Guimaraens, Vianda, and Porto; and the three others Ouvidorias, belonging to the queens-dowager, as Barcellos, Valença, and Braga. This province abounds in pasture, though in this respect short of many of those in Spain. Besides the plains are every where covered with vines, fruit-trees, and other sorts, and the country well supplied with every necessary of life.

ENTRE HOMEM é CAVADO, a district of Entre Douro é Minho, one of the Portuguese provinces, containing 18 parishes.

ENTRE TAIO é GUADIANA, or ALENTEJO, a province of Portugal, so called, as lying between the river Tagus and Guadiana. It is bounded by Estremadura on the N. Spain on the E. Algarve on the S. and the Atlantic ocean on the E.

E P

ENTREVAUX, in Latin. Intervallium, a borough of Upper Provence, in France, close by Glandeves, where the bishop of the latter place has for some time resided, and the cathedral stands, upon the river Var, at the foot of the mountains, and confines of the county of Nice, in Savoy. It lies three leagues distant from Beuil to the W. and eight from the Mediterranean sea.

EOLO, (mount,) in the duchy of Spoleto, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy. It is famous for the cool wind, which, especially in summer, is said to issue from the chasms and holes in the rock. It lies between six and seven Italian miles from Terni, on the N. W. and not far from the little place called Cesi.

EOUSMILE, the most remarkable of the small isles to the W. of North Uist, a subdivision of one of the western islands of Scotland. It is a rock, about a quarter of a mile in circuit, and noted for its seal or sea-calf fishery about the close of October, where it is said 320 of these amphibious animals were once taken at a time. About three leagues and a half farther W. lie nine or ten more rocks abounding with sea-fowl and great numbers of sea-calves.

EPERIES, or ESPERIES, a strong and royal free town of Upper Hungary, on the river Tarza, four miles from the confines of Poland, the capital of Saros county, and in the circle on this side the Theifs. It is surrounded with ditches, a wall, and towers. It is the seat of the highest court in the Hither Theifs, also a college and academy. Here was formerly a collegium illustre, belonging to the Lutherans.

This place is famous for its fair and salt-mines, particularly one of the latter, out of which pieces are said to have been dug of 10,000 pounds weight of pure salt. It is of several colours. The water of the mines, when boiled, produces a salt which is given to the cattle. It is seated on the river Tarza, 20 miles N. of Cassovia, and 125 E. by N. of Presburg. Long. 21, 1, E. Lat. 48. 50, N.

Eperies was one of the four towns yielded to Bethlen Gabor, prince of Transylvania, but the Imperialists recovered it in 1710. It lies 14 miles N. of Caschau.

EPERNAY, or ESPERNAY, in Latin, Sparnacum, a town of Upper Champagne, in France, on the river Marne, which divides it into two parts. In 1592, Henry IV. took it from the Spaniards, after a vigorous resistance. At this siege Marshal de Bir6n was killed, while the king had his hand upon his shoulder. Here is a noted abbey of the order of St. Augustine. This place is the capital of an election, the seat of a bailiwick, royal provostprovostship, salt-house, and forest-court. Within the election of Epernay is produced the best Champagne wine.

EPFIG, a large market-town in the bailiwick of Benfeld, and Lower Alsace, but now one of the governments of France.

EPHES-DAMMIM, mentioned 1 Sam. xvii. 1. lay in or near about the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem.

EPHESUS, once a famous city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, near the sea, at the mouth of the river Castrus, which formed a convenient harbour here. Whilst under the Romans it was the capital of all Asia, and in it was the celebrated temple of Diana, which was burnt by Erostratus, in order to perpetuate, as he dreamed, his memory (but it rather hands down his name with infamy to posterity) the very night in which Alexander the Great was born. St. Paul honoured the Christian community in this city with an epistle.

At present, the place is reduced to a poor village, in which dwell about 30 or 40 Greek families, so wretchedly ignorant and degenerated as not to be able to read the apostle's letter to their progenitors. They live among the ruins of the place, having raised huts to shelter them from the weather. The aqueduct is still standing, but in a ruinous condition. And not far off are the remains of an old citadel, which have been adorned with some of the noblest marbles formerly belonging to the city. It lies 23 miles N. of Miletus, and 63 W. of Laodicea. Lat. 38, 16, N. Long. 27, 3, E.

EPHRAIM, (the wood of,) where Absalom perished on an oak, mentioned 2 Sam. xvii. 6-8; is undoubtedly to be understood, not of any wood lying in the tribe of Ephraim, on the W. of Jordan, (for Absalom as well as David had passed over Jordan,) but of some wood lying on the E. side of Jordan, and so named on some other account, perhaps, as lying over against the tribe of Ephraim.

EPHRAIM, (city,) to which Jesus retired, as mentioned John xi. 54. probably lay among the mountains and hills of Ephraim, and at the very edge of that tribe, towards the tribe of Benjamin.

EPHRON, is mentioned 1 Maccab. vii. 46-51, 2. Maccab. xii. 26. as a great and strong city, lying in the direct way between the land of Gilead and that of Judah. For more particulars read the quoted texts.

EPHYRA, a city of Epirus. Ephyra was also an ancient name of Corinth.

EPIDAUROS, now Malvesia; was the most noted sea-port of Laconia, or Lacedaemon, and seated on the gulph of Argos, now Golfo de Neapoli, and was a town well-built and peopled, and famed among other things for its excellent wine, called Malvesey, or Malmsey, which grew round the neighbourhood of it, and with which it supplied all other parts of Greece. The temple of Æsculapius here, the treasures of which were not much inferior in value to those of Apollo at Delphos, was plundered by Sylla.

EPILA, a town of Aragon, in Spain. It lies on the river Xalon, in the midst of pretty fruitful fields.

EPINAL, or ESPINAL, the town and jurisdiction of, belonging to Lorraine. It lies on the Moselle, and was one of the oldest domains belonging to the cathedral of Metz. In 1444, the inhabitants withdrew themselves from the bishop's allegiance, and gave themselves up to Charles VII. king of France; but in the same century the town came into the possession of the house of Lorraine, and it was confirmed to them by the treaty of the Pyrenees, in 1659, and also by that of Vincennes in 1661. It is a small city, and was formerly fortified. It is divided by the Moselle into two parts, is the seat of a provostship, with a secular abbey four convents, a college, and two hospitals.

EPIPHANIA, with the addition, ad orientem, as lying upon that river, and to distinguish it from another of the same name, on the Euphrates; was an episcopal see of Cœlo-Syria, in Asia Minor, subject to that of Apamea, the metropolis of Syria Secunda. It is supposed to be the same with that now called Amân, but more anciently Amath or Emath; of which name there were two cities of this name, in this province; namely, the Greater, the ancient Emesa; and the Lesser, this Epiphania, on the Orontes. The Itinerary placed them at 32,000 paces asunder, and the Arethusa between them.

EPIPOLÆ, a hill near Syracuse, in Sicily, exceeding steep, and difficult of access. When the Athenians besieged Syracuse, this hill was not inclosed with a wall, as in after ages, but defended by a fort called Labdalon. On Epipolæ was the famous prison Latomia, which word properly signifies a quarry. Cicero gives us a minute account of this dreadful prison, which was a cave 125 paces long, and 20 feet broad, cut out of the rock to an incredible depth. It was the work of Dionysius the Tyrant, who caused those to be shut up in it who had the misfortune to incur his displeasure.

EPIRUS, called by some Albania Inferior, and by others Canina, though the latter name be frequently restrained to the northern part of this country, a province of European Turkey. On the N. it is bounded by Albania Proper, on the N. E. by Thessaly, on the S. by Achaia, and on the W. by that part of the Ionian sea which is near the entrance of the Adriatic. Its extent from S. E. to N. W.

is 120 miles, and from W. to E. above 60. It is divided from Albania by the mountains called Chimera, anciently Juga Croceraunia, or Montes Ceraunii, as by reason of their great height, they were often thunder-struck. They extend to the gulph of Valona, terminating in a point, called Cape Languette or Chimera, forming there, with the cape of Otranto, the narrowest passage into the gulph of Venice.

Epirus is parted from Theffaly by a chain of mountains now called Mezzovo, the celebrated Pindus of the ancients, extending also between Theffaly and Achaia, now Livadia, and of which the mounts Parnassus and Helicon are parts. It is divided from Achaia by the river Achelous, now Astropotamo or Chatachi, which falls into the gulph of Patras. The soil is good, especially on mount Chimera, where is excellent pasture.

This country was anciently a kingdom, of which the famous Pyrrhus was sovereign, who waged a bloody war with the Romans, and after whose death the Epirots formed themselves into a republic. Epirus was conquered and ruined by the Romans, it then became a province to Macedon, and afterwards fell to the emperors of the East.

The Greek emperors gave it to the family of Tolhi, who took the title of despots of Epirus, and continued in possession of it, with Ætolia and Acarnania, for above two centuries, till Sultan Amurath II. drove the last despot, Leonard, out of his dominions; since which time it has been subject to the Turks. From the country of Epirus were brought into Italy, and from thence into England, &c. the first apricots, hence called mala epirotica. As the most northern division of Epirus is called Chimera or Canina, that to the S. has the appellation of Arta or Larta. The capital is Chimera.

EPOREDIA, now IVREA, a city on the Great Druria, in Italy, was built about 100 years before Christ, being first a Roman colony, and afterwards a municipium.

EPPING, in the Conqueror's survey, Eppinges, a neat market-town of Essex, about the middle of the forest of its own name; it has good inns. In its neighbourhood stands the fine seat of Copthall, originally belonging to Waltham abbey, when it was called Coppice-hall, from the adjacent woods. The town is famous for its butter, which is distinguished by its name. The weekly markets are on Thursday for cattle, and Friday for provisions. Its annual fairs are kept on Whitfun-Tuesday, and October 14, for horses, cows, and sheep; about 17 miles from London, and the same from Chelmsford.

EPPINGEN, a town in the Palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany, and the bailiwick of Bretten, Vol. I.—No. 43.

15 miles N. of Hailbron. Lat. 49, 31, N. Long. 8, 46, E.

EPSOM, a large well-built village of Surrey, about a mile long. Here are fine houses, principally belonging to the London citizens, and excellent mineral waters, issuing from an eminence nearer Alstad than Epsom; the salt made from which being commonly reputed as a gentle purgative and purifier, though in reality, my author says, that they are extracted from the liquor called bittern, made at the salt-works. In the neighbourhood are several fine seats, among which are Durdans (now Lord North) and Guildford's seats. On the neighbouring downs are horse-races. But the Epsom wells not being frequented so much now as formerly, the hall and other public apartments has gone to decay. It lies eight miles from Kingston upon Thames, and 16 from London. Here is held an annual fair, July 25, for toys.

EPWORTH, a village in Lincolnshire, 8 miles S. S. W. of Burton, with one fair, on September, 9.

EQUEA, (territory,) in S. Guinea, bounded W. by Bonoe, N. by Cammanach, and S. by Ningo and Lataby. Tilling Indian wheat is the sole business and trade.

ERA, though of old, and at first, but a mount in Messenia, became famous for being defended by Aristomenes against the Spartans.

ERBESSA, a city once of Sicily, not far from Agrigentum.

ERDBOROUGH, a place near Cossington, in Leicestershire, where is a strong Roman camp, about 800 feet in length, with a delightful prospect from it; and near it is a petrifying spring.

ERDOD, anciently a castle of the Hither Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary; but in the wars of Transylvania levelled to the ground.

ERECH, mentioned Gen. x. 10. as one of Nimrod's cities, &c. See our article Chaldaea; and let us here add, that according to the eastern authors it is the same with Hadas or Edeffa, called Urhoi by the Syrians, Roha by the Arabs, and Orfa by the inhabitants.

ERETRIA, an ancient city of the island Euboea, on the coast over against Oropus in Attica, was according to Strabo, in greatness, beauty, and wealth, the next to Chalcis. It borrowed the name of Eretria from Eretrius the son of Phæton, one of the Titans, and was built, according to Strabo, by the Athenians before the Trojan war. Herodotus tells us that it was peopled by Æolus and Clothus, two Athenians, after the destruction of Troy. Others will have it to be a colony of another city in Attica bearing the same name.

ERFURT, a fine city, and the capital of Thuringia, in Upper Saxony, Germany, on the Gere or Gera, with a ferry, from whence it was originally called Gareford. It is the see of a bishop, has a celebrated university, a large cathedral, several libraries and curious museums, with two forts. It is defended by good ramparts, and the castle on the hill commands it. Erfurt lies in a fruitful plain, between Weymar and Gotha, 14 miles from each; the country round it abounding with grain and good wines; both which articles, together with wool, are sold at the two great fairs here in Trinity week, and at Martinmas. The principal churches are in the hands of the Romanists, though the inhabitants are mostly Lutherans. It is subject to the elector of Mentz. Lat. 50, 49, N. Long. 11, 14, E.

ERGERS, in Latin Ergitia, a considerable river of Alsace, now a part of France: at its rise it is called Ehn, and falls into the Ill.

ERIDANUS, the ancient name of the Po, a river of Italy. See Po.

ERIE, (Lake,) a large collection of inland waters, on the west of Pennsylvania, in North America; it communicates with lake Ontario or Frontinac, by the outlet Niagara, where is the greatest cataract or water-fall in the world, if Charlevoix's account of it be not exaggerated. In the country between these lakes, which are pretty thick here, and the British colonies, dwell the Iroquois nations. The lake lies between lat. 41 and 42 N. and between long. 80 and 87 W.

ERIES, a nation of Indians in Canada. About the year 1655 they were extirpated by the Iroquois: and though the beginning of the war did not turn out in favour of the latter, yet they were not at all discouraged by it; and at last they got so much the advantage over the Eries, that were it not for the great lake which to this day bears the name of that nation, one would not have known that they ever existed. This Erie-lake empties itself into that of Ontario, by a canal, called the Leap of Niagara.

ERICIRA, or ERICEIRA, a small place of Portuguese Estremadura, containing 560 inhabitants.

ERIGINA, the name of the ancient town of Air, in the district of Kyle, in the W. of Scotland.

ERITHRÆ, one of the 12 Ionian cities in Asia Minor, is placed by some on the shore over-against the island of Chios, but by Strabo on the peninsula at the foot of mount Mimas, over-against the four islands, called by the ancients Hippi, (the Horses); Erithræ was the seat of Heropile, one of the Sybils, thence called the Erithrean. It had a spacious harbour called Cyllus, and a temple of Hercules, which was reckoned one of the most stately edifices of all Asia. Erithræ sided on all occasions with the Romans, who rewarded their fidelity with ample privileges, and considerably enlarged their territory. It is at present called Gessme, and is dwindled into a village on the Ionian coast between Clazomene and Teos.

ERIVAN, a city of Chirvan, in Persia, to which empire it is now subject, though it has long fluctuated between it and Turkey, in the confines of which latter, in Europe, it lies. It is a large, but very dirty and ill-built place, by which run two rivers, the Zengui on the N. W. and the Queurboulac, or Forty Fountains, on the S. W. It stands high, and the territory belonging to it produces corn of all sorts, rice, cotton, &c. The walls are stout, but low. It lies 100 paces from the old town of Erivan. Over the Zengui is a stately bridge of four arches. Here provisions are very cheap and plentiful; the wine and fruits excellent, and game in great variety. Here are some handsome edifices, with a fortress, garrison, and governor; which last officer raises on this province 900,000 livres, besides what he gets out of the pay of the troops, for guarding the frontiers. It lies 171 miles N. W. of Tauris. On the N. side of the city is a deep lake of the same name, 25 miles in circuit, with an island in it, and monastery, the religious of which lead a very austere life, whose superior assumes the title of patriarch. This lake empties itself by the Zengui, which, after a course of some leagues between Erivan and the famous monastery of the three churches, falls into the Araxes, and with it into the Caspian sea.

ERKELENS, a city in the duchy of Juliers, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It lies on the Roer, 14 miles N. of Juliers city. Lat. 50, 27, N. Long. 5, 49, E.

ERLANG, or CHRISTIAN-ERLANGER, in the marquisate of Bareith, and circle of Franconia, in Germany, has the latter name from the marquis Christian, who entertained a colony of French refugees here, after the revocation of the edict of Nantz, who built here a pretty town in the heart of a wood. They have set up all sorts of manufactures; and here is a very handsome palace, with noble gardens. It stands on the Schwabach, which a little lower falls into the Rednitz, and is on the confines of Bamberg and Nuremberg. About it are vast numbers of firs, with plantations of hops and tobacco.

ERLAU, or EGER, in Latin Agria, an episcopality of the Hither Circle of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary, is surrounded with old walls and bulwarks; and in its neighbourhood is a strong castle on a hill. It has been much reduced by frequent sieges, and successful attacks. The bishop resides here, who has a considerable revenue; and in this place was a college and academy of Jesuits.

Good

Good red wine is produced about Erlau; and not far from it is a warm bath. In 1552 the place made a brave defence against the Turks; but in 1596 was obliged to surrender. In 1606 the Imperialists rifled the town, and committed great outrages in it; but could not make themselves masters of the castle.

ERMELAND, or WERMELAND, in Latin Warmia, or Episcopatus Varmienfis, a subdivision of Polish Prussia. It is quite surrounded with Brandenburg Prussia; belongs to no palatinate or woywodship, but is simply and solely subject to the bishop and chapter of the cathedral; so that neither the gentry, nor other inhabitants, can appeal to any other court. To the bishop belong two-thirds of the territory, or circuit of the diocese, and the other third part to the chapter. Their vassals have the same laws as the rest of Prussia; yet they have some peculiar ordinances, and also general diets in common among themselves; but have nothing to do with those of Prussia.

ERMENŤ, the ancient Hermenthis, a place of Upper Egypt, in Africa, where Jupiter and Apollo were formerly worshipped. Here are some temples, with curious hieroglyphics carved on them; at a little distance from which is one with Coptic inscriptions and paintings; among the latter are crosses on the walls, from which this seems to have been turned into a Christian church, though originally built for some Pagan deity.

ERMINGTON, in Devonshire; with a fair on February 3.

ERN, or IERN, (Valley of,) some say Claudian's Glacialis Ierne, a very pleasant dale or strath, hence called Strathern, in Perthshire, and middle division of Scotland, lying along the banks of the river or water of Ern, on which are several gentlemen's seats, and among these Tullibardin; and in the road to Perth has a bridge, called the brigg of Ern. This river Ern rises far W. on the confines of the western Highlands, near Glengyle, from a lough or lake of its name seven miles long, and one broad; which, after a course of about 34 miles from W. to E. and the junction of several streams in its passage through a very mountainous country, the highest in Scotland, falls into the Tay at Abernethy, and N. of Perth.

Of the same name is another valley S. of Inverness, commonly pronounced STRADERN, which see.

ERNEE, a town of Upper Maine, in France, in which is a salt granary, a convent, and an hospital.

EROPINA, a petty kingdom of Negroland, in Africa, extending about 14 leagues along the river Gambia. Through this country runs the river

Yarrie, more known by the name of Eropina, near which is a town of the same name.

ERPACH, (County of,) in the circle of Franconia, in Germany, on the S. side of the Mayne, between the Lower Palatinate and archbishopric of Mentz. It is 27 (14) miles long, and about 12 (20) in breadth. Thus variously are its dimensions given. This country is well watered, most of the names of the towns and villages ending in bach, i. e. a brook or small stream, being surrounded with the Rhine, Neckar, and Mayne: so that it abounds with fruitful valleys, corn, vineyards, and rich meadow grounds. Here a great number of iron stoves are made, which are sold into other parts of Germany.

ERPACH, the capital of the last-mentioned county of the same name. It lies 33 miles S. E. of Frankfurt. Lat. 49, 36, N. Long. 8, 56, E.

ERQUICO, a town on the coast of Abex, one of the provinces in Africa, at the mouth of a harbour on the Red Sea, and subject to the Turks. It lies 32 miles S. W. of Mecca. Lat. 17, 20, N. Long. 39, 16, E.

ERICKSTONE, tract in Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, in the S. of Scotland, from which to Maul's mitre, confining on the shire of Renfrew, are evident vestiges of a Roman causeway for several miles together; and a Roman street is said, by tradition, to have gone from Lanerk to the Roman camp near Falkirk.

ERSILTON, a place in the shire of Berwick and S. of Scotland. It lies on the river Leoder (Lauder), and is the seat of a presbytery, containing 10 parishes.

ERSTEIN, one of the largest market towns in all Alsace, now a government of France. Here is a convent: and to it belongs the inn, and tile and brick kiln of Kraft.

ERSTE, a populous village in the Further Circle of the Theifs, in Upper Hungary. It lies in a fruitful country, towards the Danube.

ERWASH, a river of Derbyshire, its boundary on the W. as the Dove is on the E. and the Trent on the S. whilst the Derwent runs through the middle of the county. All of them begin and end their course in Derbyshire; for they rise in the Peak, and terminate in the Trent.

ERYTHIA, an island famous in ancient history, as being the place where Geyron kept the celebrated breed of oxen which Hercules is said to have stolen from him. It has long been sought for in vain, and is generally thought to be one of the Spanish islands in the Mediterranean.

ERYTHREA, or rather ÆRYTHREA, the birth-place of the Sibyl of that name, in Ionia and Asia Minor, or Asiatic Turkey. It was antiently a con-a considerable sea-port, with four islands before it, called Hippi, or the Horses. Its present name is Gesme, and it has quite dwindled into a village. It lies on the Ionian coast, between Clazomene and Teos.

ERYX, in Sicily, stood on the top of a hill of the same name, at a small distance from the sea, and the place now called Trepano del Monte. The city borrowed its name from the mountain, as did that from Eryx, the son of Venus, said to have been there killed by Hercules. Mela says that Æneas built a temple on the top of the mountain in honour of his said mother. It is certain that the votaries of this goddess came in crowds from all parts of Greece, Italy, &c. to make their offerings to her in this place, whence she was stiled Venus Erycina. Eryx was the seat of king Acestes, who so kindly entertained Æneas and his wandering Trojans. Hamilcar, in the first year of the first Punic war, razed this ancient city, and repaired Drepanum with materials brought from thence. It was soon after rebuilt; for we find it the last city the Carthaginians held in Sicily, and delivered up to the Romans at the end of the same war. In Strabo's time it was almost quit deserted, few resorting to the temple after the Romans had built a magnificent one to Venus Erycina at a small distance from the gate Collina.

ERZERUM, the capital of Turcomania, the ancient Armenia Major. It lies in a delightful level, and at the foot of a range of mountains, which are generally covered with snow till Midsummer, and near the source of the Euphrates. Its circuit is two miles, has a double wall and towers round it, which are very ancient. Here the Turkish beglerbeg or viceroy resides; also an aga of the Janissaries, who is independent of the other. The number of its inhabitants is said to be 18,000 Turks, and 6000 Armenians, whose chief trade is carried on in furs and copper utensils; the metal for which is dug up very plentifully out of the neighbouring mountains. It is a considerable thoroughfare both from Persia and India to Constantinople, by the way of Trebisond and the Caspian sea, in order to avoid the Arabs who infest the road leading to Aleppo. The city stands on a peninsula, formed by the two springs of the Euphrates; one of which lies a day's journey, and the other but half that distance, from Erzerum. Whence every week sets out some caravan or other, for Tocat, Fel-tauris, Trebisond, or Aleppo. But from these money is frequently extorted by the natives of Curdistan, or the ancient Assyria, who ramble about with their flocks and herds to the springs of Euphrates. These Curdes call themselves Jasides, or followers of Jesus: but the truth is, that all their religion consists entirely in some superstitious modes and observances. They acknowledge subjection to neither Turks nor Persians: but when attacked, retire to their bleak, inaccessible mountains, where they have but very little difficulty to defend themselves from any attempt. It lies 136 miles S. of Trebisond and the Euxine sea. Lat. 39, 46, N. Long. 40, 56, E.

ESCALHAO, a town of Beira, a province of Portugal, containing 940 inhabitants.

ESCALONA, a town of New Castile, in Spain, standing high on the little river Alterche. it is covered by a large castle; and here is a collegiate church.

ESCATARI, a small island about five leagues N. of Louisbourg, in the island of Cape-Breton.

ESCHAUT. See SCHELD.

ESCHELLES, a town of Savoy Proper. It lies 18 miles S. W. of Chamberry. Lat. 45, 22, N. Long. 5, 21, E. See ECHELLES.

ESCHILSTUNA, or CARL-GUSTAVUS-STADT, in a fief of the former name, and Sudermania, in Sweden Proper; it is an inland town at the extremity of the Hielmars whence, by means of a strong stream, it falls into the Maler-lake: it takes its name from St. Eschil, who came hither in 1082 from England; and preached Christianity in Sudermania; and was the first bishop of this place, which was afterwards united with Carl-Gustavus-Stadt, lying near it; the latter having the privileges of a town conferred upon it in 1659. It has the 42d rank in the general diet among the townships.

ESCHWEGEN, a town of Hesse Cassel, and Upper Rhine, in Germany. It lies 26 miles S. E. of the city of Cassel, and subject to the Landgrave of that name. Lat. 51, 21, N. Long. 9, 48, E.

ESCUEVA, a small river running through Valladolid, in Old Castile, in Spain, over which is a large stone-bridge. See VALLADOLID.

ESCURIAL, a very stately royal palace, in New Castile, in Spain; yet lies in a dry barren country, surrounded with mountains. King Philip II. began to build it in 1557, the year in which he gained the victory of St. Quintin over the French. It was 22 years in building, and cost him immense sums. It is a large oblong square, and may be looked upon as a town, having, it is said, 11,000 windows, 22 courts, and 17 cloisters or piazzas, besides a church, college, monastery, dwelling-houses, shops, artificers, &c. and yet a profound silence reigns here. Its principal front is towards the W. or the mountains, with three beautiful gates, that in the middle being the largest and most magnificent, and a noble portico, adorned with Doric, Corinthian, and Ionic pillars. It is very grandly furnished, and contains 40 chapels with as many altars. In the principal chapel is the treasury, treasury, the high-altar, which, from the bottom to the roof consists of the most beautiful jasper. This chapel is said to have cost five millions. The sacristy on the side of the choir is a very large hall, with fine paintings by Titian, and other celebrated masters. Here are most magnificent altar-ornaments and sacerdotal vestments: all the vases are of silver and gold, with a gold crucifix, in which are set extraordinary large pearls, rubies, turquoises, emeralds and diamonds of uncommon worth. The pantheon or burying-place for the kings and queens of Spain, after the model of that at Rome, is under the high-altar, and the greatest curiosity in the Escorial. It was begun by the emperor Charles V. carried on by Philip II. and III. and completed by Philip IV.

The royal arms consists of all kinds of fine stones of various colours, with a striking lustre of the most precious metals, and gems on all hands. The roof is supported by 16 jasper-pillars, of divers colours, behind which are others of marble in perspective, and the capitals of all are gilt-metal. The chapel at the end of the pantheon is very curiously embellished, having a gold crucifix set with diamonds of great worth, &c. The Escorial has a spacious park, with groves, cascades, grottos, and fine vistas. From the palace is an open prospect of Madrid, which is about 22 miles off; and as far as the village of its own name, is an avenue about half a mile long.

ESDRAELON. In Palestine are two great plains, one of which in the New Testament called the region about Jordan, of which we shall here say no more; the other from the city of Jezreel, and Legion, is called the plain of Jezreel, or Ezraelon, or the great plain of Legion.

ESENS, a town of Embden and Westphalia, in Germany, on a river of the same name, which a little below falls into the sea. It lies 22 miles N. of the city of Embden. Lat. 54, 12, N. Long. 6, 48, E.

ESFARAIN, a town of Asia, in the province of Chorazan, famous for the great number of writers it produced. It is 90 miles east of Astrabad. Long. 41, 23, E. Lat. 36, 48, N.

ESGUEIRA, an ancient but small town of Beira, in Portugal, containing between 15 and 1600 inhabitants in one parish, which is a vicarage and commendary of the order of Christ, with a house of mercy, and an hospital. It is the capital of a provedorship, under the jurisdiction of which are several other places, to the number of 30. The civil power of the town is lodged in the convent of Lovaro; but the king's officers determine the capital matters.

ESHTAOL, mentioned in Judges xiii. 25, in the history of Sampson, is again mentioned in Vol. I.—No. 43.

xviii. 2. as a principal city of the Danites, whence the men that took Laish were sent.

ESHCRIFE, or ASIREF, according to De Lisle, a city of Ghilan, in Persia, near the sea-coast, containing 2000 houses, and famous as the residence of king Abbas the Great. It lies 38 miles from Ferabath on the E. and within two miles of the Caspian sea, in a low ground, surrounded with salt-marshes. The palace is large but not very regular, though sumptuously decorated and furnished.

ESHWEGE. See ESCHWEGE.

ESINGWALD, a market-town in the North-Riding of Yorkshire, on the N. E. side of Boroughbridge. It lies 210 miles from London.

ESK, a little river in the North-Riding of Yorkshire, at the influx of which into the sea, stands the town of Whitby.

Of the same name is a river in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, on which stands Inveresk; and though sometimes so full of water as to overflow its banks, and a rapid stream, yet is not made navigable.

Also a pretty large river in the shire of Dumfries, which watering the S. E. part of it on the valley of Eskdale, from which it has its name, and forming part of the boundary between Scotland and England, after running from N. E. to S. W. falls at last into the Solway frith.

ESKIMAUX, or ESQUIMAUX, one of the fiercest people of all North America. They dwell on its most eastern verge, beyond the river of St. Lawrence, and spread themselves up N. and E. into the large track called Terra de Labrador, opposite to Newfoundland, from lat. 50 to 64, and from long. 59 to 80. They were at first discovered by the Danes, who did not think it worth their while to make any settlement, or even carry on any traffic among them. Their name is supposed to be originally Esquimantfic, which, in the Albenagin dialect, signifies eaters of raw flesh; they being almost the only people in those parts that eat it so, though they use also to boil, or dry it in the sun.

But the complexions, customs, language, &c. they seem to be a quite different people from all the other Americans, and probably are descended from the Groenlanders; but they are of so savage and brutal a nature, that no European nation cares to claim kindred with them. And such as trade among them for furs, the only commodity they bring down from the inland, and exchange for knives, scissars, pots, kettles, &c. are obliged to keep them off at staff's length, and not suffer them to come in too great numbers; for when they do, they make no scruple of plundering, instead of bartering. They hate the Europeans, and are always ready to do them them some mischief; so that they will come to the water-side, and cut their cables in the night, hoping to see them wrecked upon their coast against the next morning.

They are generally tall, stout, and nimble, with a skin as fair as that of any European, because they always go covered, even in the hottest weather. Their hair and beards are either sandy or brown, and very bushy; and the latter, (those being almost the only people of this country who have any) grows up almost to their very eyes; which gives them a very dreadful look; at least one is at a loss to discover the features of their face. They have small eyes, that look wild, large and very dirty teeth, hair commonly black, sometimes brown, very much disordered, and a brutal appearance all over. Their manners and character do not belie this bad physiognomy. They are fierce, wild, distrustful, restless, and always disposed to strangers a mischief, who ought to be continually on their guard against them. With regard to their genius, so little traffic is carried on with this nation, that one knows not yet what particular bias it is of. However they have always enough for doing mischief.

They make themselves shirts of the wind-bladders, guts, and skins of fish, which they sew in slips neatly enough, but they come down no lower than the middle with the men, and down to the knees with the women: over that they wear a short jacket, made of the skins of bears, or other wild creatures, as also those of dogs, and sea-calves, with a cape hanging behind, which they throw over their heads in bad weather, so that scarce any part of their face can be seen. They wear also breeches and boots made of the same skins, with the fur inward, and the outside they adorn with sable, ermine, or other fine skins. The men's jackets come down only half way to the thighs, and those of the women below the calf. Both are tied to a girdle, to which they commonly hang some trinkets made of fish or other bone, or such other toys as they barter with the Europeans.

In summer they live in huts in the open air, but in winter they withdraw to their caverns under ground. The French at several times built some forts and little towns on their frontiers, such as Cartier, St. Nicholas, Chichequedec, Port Neuf, and Port Beau, &c. in hopes of civilizing and introducing a traffic among them, as well as for the security of the missionaries who were to convert them, to Christianity. But they were found so shy and indocile, that those settlements have since fallen to decay.

They are reckoned to be so numerous as to have at least 30,000 fighting men; but they are so cowardly, that 500 Clifinos of Hudson's-Bay, commonly beat 5 or 6000 of them. They are dangerous at sea, as well as land, and with their canoes, into a sort of which they sometimes can throw 30 or 40 men, they so infest the cod and other fisheries, that the Malowins on the N. and the Spaniards of Porto Chova, are forced to arm some of their barco longos, in order to protect their fishermen, they making nothing of crossing over into Newfoundland, by the straits of Belleisle, which are about seven leagues broad, but they seldom venture farther.

The Esquimaux are used to drink salt water; and frequently they have no other. This however, is not sea water, but got from some brackish ponds, such as are sometimes to be met with far up in the country.

By some Danish vessels, which in 1605, sailed pretty high beyond Hudson's-Bay, we learn that they met with little men, who had square heads, a tawny complexion, and large protuberant lips; these eat both flesh and fish quite raw, who would never take to bread, or drink boiled victuals, and still less to wine; drink whale oil as we do water; and devoured flesh by way of dainty.

The canoes of these pigmies resemble a weaver's shuttle, being 10 or 12 feet long. They are constructed of pieces of whale-bone, about the thickness of one's finger, covered on both sides with the skins of seals, or sea-calves, sewed together with sinews; two other skins cover the top of the canoe, so that only an opening is left in the middle for the rower, and he draws it close round his loins like a purse; so that being set down, and thus fastened by the middle, they do not receive one drop of water into the canoe, though the waves should roll over their heads, and be sometimes surrounded with them every way.

The strength of these machines consists in the two ends, where the whalebone is well fastened together by the extremities; and the whole so compact, and well sewed, that these small vessels can weather out the most violent storms. In these canoes only one man generally manages each, in which he is sitting, with his legs extended, his sleeves tied close about his wrists, and his head wrapped in a kind of cowl fastened to his jacket; so that whatever happens, the water cannot penetrate it. They hold with both hands an oar, broad at each end, and between five and six feet long, which serves at the same time as an oar, rudder, and balance, or counterpoise. In these canoes the pigmies are very dexterous, and move very swiftly.

The Esquimaux who use the same sort of canoes, have also other vessels, which are larger, and nearly resembling the decked chaloupes among the French. The ribs of these are made of wood, but covered with the same skins as the other. They carry carry about 150 persons, and go either with sails or oars.

The Esquimaux are the only natural inhabitants ever seen on the coast of Newfoundland, who pass thither from the main land of Labrador, in order to hunt, and for the sake of traffic with Europeans. One of their women was brought to England and presented at court in the year 1773.

ESKIMAU, or NEW-BRITAIN, and Terra de Labrador, is the country of that people bearing the first name, situated as above described. It was yielded to Great-Britain by the peace of Utrecht, in 1713. But no colonies have been sent thither from these kingdoms, a few small settlements at the bottom of Hudson's-bay excepted. Here the Indians and Canadians hunt for furs, though they have no colonies in the country.

ESKLE, a river in Herefordshire, which runs into the Monnow at Landtown.

ESLA, a river of Leon, in Spain, rising in the neighbourhood of the city of the former name; and after its junction with the Orbego, below Benavente, their united stream falls into the Douro.

ESLING, or ESLINGEN, an imperial town of Lower Suabia, in Germany, on the E. side of the Neckar. Here is some trade, and it is a place noted for good baths. The establishment is entirely Protestant, as are most of the inhabitants, and under the protection of the duke of Wirtemberg. Near this place, the emperor Lewis of Bavaria defeated and took prisoner the archduke Frederic of Austria, whom he obliged to renounce his pretensions to the imperial crown. It lies ten miles S. E. of Stutgard. Lat. 48, 46, N. Long. 9, 18, E.

ESNE, or ASNA, Sir P. Lucas's Essnai, and supposed to be the ancient Seine, a town of Upper Egypt, in Africa, and on the W. bank of the Nile, under the tropic of Cancer. Its inhabitants are rich, especially in corn and cattle. They drive a considerable trade up the Nile into Nubia, and by the land-caravans through the desert. Here are noble remains of antiquity. The Christians here amounting to 200, have a large church, and two priests; and it lies near the grand cataract. Lat. 23, 26, N. Long. 35, 6, E.

ESOPUS, a town on the North River, which was destroyed by the British forces, with stores and many American vessels. Oct. 15, 1777.

ESPAIGNAC, though a small place on the river Tarn, in Lower Languedoc, in France, yet has a priory and a collegiate church belonging to it.

ESPERIE, a town of Hungary, near which are the famous salt-mines. It is 15 miles N. of Cashaw, and 40 N. of Tockay. Long. 20 50, E. Lat. 48, 50, N.

ESPERIES, a town of Flanders. It lies 10 miles miles N. of Tournay. Lat. 50, 55, N. Long. 3, 21, E. See EPERIES.

ESPERNAY. See EPERNAY.

ESPINAL, a town of Lorrain. It lies 41 miles E. of Nancy. Lat. 48, 26, N. Long. 6, 20, E. See EPINAL.

ESPINOSA DE LOS MONTEROS, though a small place, is situated in a pleasant and fruitful valley, in the heart of the mountains of Burgos, in Old Castile, and upon the little river Trueva.

ESPIRITU SANTO, a fort at the mouth of the river Carcaranna, which falls into that of Plate, in Paraguay, in S. America.

ESPINOSA, the name of the two small islands of Spain, the one in Biscay, and the other in Old Castile.

ESPOSENDE, a town of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal, with a harbour only for small vessels, close by the influx of the river Cavado into the sea, and covered by a little fort. Here is but one parish, a house of mercy, and an hospital.

ESSAB, or EZZAB, one of the provinces of Africa, of which little seems to be known, or at least inconsiderable. It begins on the W. beyond the mountains of Garion and Beniguarid, and is bounded on the E. by the river Magra, which divides it from Mazerata. Mount Garion in this province, and which stands N. of Atlas, is very high and cold, being parted from those of Benitefren and Nefusus by several deserts, in which are said to be 130 villages; but their inhabitants the Bereberes are such arrant cowards as to let the Arabs plunder them: whereas those of Beniguarid keep those robbers off by a manly resistance. This province yields but little corn, yet has plenty of olives, dates, and saffron, the latter selling at Cairo a third part dearer than any other.

ESSAY, a town of Lower Normandy, in France, the seat of a bailiwick, and giving title of viscount. Here is one parish, an abbey, and an hospital.

ESSEK, or OSSEK, the capital of Verovitz county, and banat of Slavonia, in Hungary: it stands upon the Drave, which falls into the Danube just by. It is a pretty large place, and strongly fortified. The most remarkable thing here is its large wooden bridge over the Drave, and neighbouring morasses, a mile in length, and 30 yards broad. It consisted of thick planks of oak supported by nine or ten large trees in a row, between each arch. It was raised in 1566 by the emperor Solymán, who had 20,000 men at work upon it. In 1664 count Serini burnt the bridge down to the ground, but the Turks soon put it up again; in 1685 the Hungarians burnt a part of it, and the following year they entirely tirely destroyed it by fire. The town has been often taken; and after the battle of Mohaty the Imperialists drove the Turks out of it; so that it is now subject to the house of Austria. Here are large caravanseras or inns, for the accommodation of armies or travellers continually passing this way: the houses are of timber, and the streets flanked with trees. It lies 75 miles N. W. of Belgrade, which, on account of its garrison, and a Slavonian regiment of horse lying in its neighbourhood, is reckoned one of the military towns. Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 20, 22, E.

ESSEN, an Imperial town of Berg, on the confines of the Marck, in Westphalia, in Germany, with a rich nunnery, whose abbess is a princess of the empire, and the nuns are all noblemen's daughters, and may marry at pleasure; the free exercise of religion being allowed in the cloyster, which is under the king of Prussia's protection. The inhabitants are excellent artificers in iron, particularly fire-arms; and the neighbouring country abounds in wheat and coals. It lies 12 miles N. E. of Dusseldorp. Lat. 51, 31, N. Long. 6, 39, E.

ESSENBECK, a parish-church in North Jutland, in Denmark, where a convent was founded in 1040, the very first in the kingdom of which we have any certain account.

ESSERUM, a royal domain or seat of Seeland, in Denmark, which is a very delightful place, well provided with wood, and rivers abounding in fish. At present it is converted into barracks for horse. Before the Reformation here was a rich and celebrated convent of Bernardines, founded in 1150, which was the principal of this order in all Denmark, and furnished the whole North with monks.

ESSEX, so called from the East Saxons, a county of England, and a kind of peninsula. It is washed on the E. by the German ocean, on the N. by the river Stour, which parts it from Suffolk and Cambridgeshire, on the W. by the river Lea, which divides it from Middlesex, and by the river Stort, which separates it from Hertfordshire; and on the S. by the Thames. Its extent from E. to W. is 40 miles, and from N. to S. 35, though the dimensions given of it vary. It contains, according to Templeman, 1,240,000 acres, 22 (27) market towns, and 415 parishes; besides 46 parks, one forest, and a castle with 208,800 inhabitants. Besides the two knights of the shire, it sends two members for each of the towns, Malden, Colchester, and Harwich. It is one of the shires in the home circuit.

The air of Essex is in general temperate; but near the sea and the Thames moist and agueish, though the marsh-lands there abound with rich pastures, corn lands, and cattle, as horses, fat oxen, and sheep; it abounds also in wood and wild fowl; and its northern parts, especially about Saffron Walden, produce large quantities of saffron; after three crops of which, the soil produces barley, for two others successively, without manure. In other parts are hops.

In Essex the soil is best where the air is worst, and the former is worst where the latter is best. No county in England affords provisions of all sorts more plentifully than this, not only for its own consumption, but the supply of the London markets. Its calves are admired for the whiteness and delicacy of their flesh; so that these, and the number of their stiles, (from the infinity of small inclosures in Essex,) have become proverbial. They have plenty of fish of all sorts from the sea and their rivers; particularly vast quantities of fine oysters, on the coast, which are sent up pickled to London, especially from Colchester, in small kegs.

In the marshes of Essex it is frequent to meet with men that have had from five or six to 14 or 15 wives; and sometimes it is said more, even 25 or 35. The reason is, that the farmers here have wives from the uplands, who soon contract agues, and go off in little more than a year: nor do the men hold it out any more in these parts, than in other countries.

The marsh-lands of Essex are included in the three hundreds of Barstable, Rochford, and Dengy. In another part of the county is the hundred of Hinkford, which is so large as to be one-eighth of the whole.

ESSEX county, next to Cornwall county, in New England, is not very fertile, except it be near the sea coast, where the towns are built for the convenience of fishing. The river Merrimack, which waters it, is barred in some places, or it would be navigable up very high within land. A little above one of the falls of this river is a place called Ammuskeag, where a huge rock lies in the midst of the stream, on the top of which are a great number of pits, made exactly round like barrels or hogsheds, of different sizes, some of which would hold several tons. It cannot be very judiciously guessed how the savages could, without iron instruments, possibly work such cavities in stone, yet they are plainly artificial. Salem is the chief town.

ESSEX county in New Jersey is of note chiefly for Elizabeth town.

ESSEX county, in Virginia, lies between Middlesex and Richmond, and contains 140,920 acres of land. In this and Middlesex lies the great swamp swamp called the Dragon-swamp, near 60 miles long, over-run with briars, thorns, and wild beasts, which there herd, because it is almost inaccessible. In this country are three parishes.

ESEQUEBO. See SURINAM.

ESTAIN, or ETAIN, a provostship, formerly belonging to the chapter of Verdun, now belonging to Lorrain, a government of France.

Of the same name is also an old town here, and likewise another in Guyenne Proper, in France.

ESTAMPES, in Latin Stampæ, in Le Gatinois François of the Isle of France. It lies on the little river Juine, is the seat of an election, royal court, and provostship, a granary for salt, and a marsh-land. It has its own laws, with five parochial churches, six convents, and two chapters. Here three provincial synods and one national council have been held.

In 1652, and Lewis XIV.'s minority, this city having been betrayed into the hands of the princes of Condé and Conti, sustained a siege of six weeks, and several assaults against the king's army, with the loss of many on both sides; when the latter were at last obliged to raise it, in order to go and meet the duke of Lorrain, who was coming with 10,000 men to their assistance. It lies 28 miles S. of Paris. Lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

ESTAPA, or ESTAPE, a town belonging to the province of Tabasco, and audience of Mexico, in New Spain. It is mentioned by Dampier as situated on the river Tabasco, four leagues beyond Villa de Mosc. It is said to be a place of good trade; and so strong, that it repulsed captain Hewet when he attacked it with 200 desperate buccaneers.

ESTAPLES, or ETAPLES, in Latin Stapulæ, or Stabula, a borough or small town of the Boulonnais, and Picardy, in France, on the river Canche, near its mouth; with a harbour on the English channel for small vessels only. This is supposed to be the Portus Iccious, afterwards Vicus, mentioned by Cæsar. Here is a bailiwick-provostship, and the inhabitants trade in herrings and mackarel: it lies 14 miles S. of Boulogne. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 1, 29, E.

ESTARKE, an ancient town of Asia, in Persia, seated in a country abounding in wine and dates, 30 miles from Schiras.

ESTE, anciently ATESTE, was formerly a town of Gallia Transpadana, and now in Il Paduana, a territory of Upper Italy, belonging to the republic of Venice, on the Bacchiglione, near Monti di Padua. Lat. 45, 30, N. Long. 12, 12, E.

ESTECO, in the province of Tucuman, in South America, is a small town conveniently situated for relief of travellers out of Peru to the river of Plate and Paraguay through Tucuman; but its air is unwholesome.

ESTECHIMINES, savage nations confining on Nova Scotia. See MALECITIES.

ESTELLA, or ESTELA, in Latin Stella, (city of,) in the district of its own name, and kingdom of Navarre, in Spain. It is a genteel place, in a delightful plain on the river Ega, (Egra) over which are four bridges, with a wall and good old castle, six parishes, four monasteries, &c. also an university. It abounds with all the necessaries of life; and under its jurisdictions are several towns and villages. It lies 25 miles S. W. of Pampeluna, Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 2, 12, W.

ESTENA, a town of Granada, in Spain. It lies 47 miles N. of Malaga. Lat. 37 20, N. Long. 5, 8, W.

ESTEPONA, a town of Andalusia, in Spain. It stands high on the Mediterranean sea, not far from St. Roche.

ESTHER-TOWN, a town in Lancaster-county, Pennsylvania, situated on the E. bank of the Susquehannah river, 10 miles S. W. of Middletown, and 12 miles N. E. of Carlisle.

ESTHONA, in a larger sense, is a province included under Livonia; but taken more strictly, it lies N. of it, and together with it, is, since the beginning of this century, subject to Russia, having been conquered from Sweden. The Germans call both Esthland, from their inhabitants the Esthi. The Russians now comprehend Esthonia under the general government of Reval, and it is called the little districts, Wyk; which are subdivided into Land and Strand Wyk, East and West Harrien, Jerwen, and Wirrland; to which also belongs Alentakien. Its capital is Narva. See LIVONIA.

ESTOMBAR, a church-village of Algarve, in Portugal, where was formerly a castle, which is one of those still represented in the royal arms.

ESTRAVAYER, a handsome town of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg, with a fine castle, seated on the eastern banks of the lake of Neuchâtel. Long. 6, 55, E. Lat. 46, 46, N.

ESTRELLA, a famous mountain, by the Romans called Mons Herminius, lying in the district of Guarda, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It takes up two hours and a half to go up to the top from the town of S. Romao, which is at the foot of it; and in ascending it there is observed in several places that the mountain is hollow, and a hoarse noise heard like that of a stream underneath passing along. Farther on is a quarry of excellent alabaster, and on the top of the mountain are pastures uncommonly beautiful, with several fine rivulets, yielding yielding very clear and well-tasted water. But the most remarkable thing on this mountain is, a lake surrounded with high rocks, the water of which springs out of the ground, very clear, moderately warm, and in the middle makes a quivering motion, small bubbles rising up from time to time on it. As it draws in every thing to it, probably there is an opening, through which it is again discharged, and is the spring from which some other lake is fed that lies lower; whence at last large brooks proceed, which form a river running towards the foot of the mountain. From a place lying in a deep valley on it, Lisbon is provided all summer with snow, though the city be upwards of 60 Spanish miles off. The Portuguese tell frightful stories about this mountain and lake.

ESTREMADURA, the ancient country, partly of the Vettones, and partly of the Turdetani, and once the principal part of Lusitania, has, since the dismembering of Portugal from Spain, been divided into two parts, one belonging to each kingdom. That in Spain is divided from Portuguese Estremadura on the W. by the rivers Elia, Caya, and some others of less note; on the N. it borders on Leon, without any noted river or mountain to part them; on the E. the mountains of Banos, Pico, and Guadaloupe, divide it from Old and New Castile; and on the S. it is separated from Andalusia by the chain of mountains called Sierra Morena.

It has the name of Estremadura, from its being the utmost boundary between the kingdom of Leon and the Moorish dominions; or from the conquests made of the latter, beginning from Leon and all beyond, called Extrema Durii, or the lands lying beyond the river Douro, in the same manner as the province of Entre Douro e Minho is called Extrema Minii. The Tagus and Guadiana running through it from E. to W. divide it into three parts; the most northern of which lies beyond the Tagus; the next is between that and the Guadiana, and the last is that S. of the Guadiana. In their course these receive several smaller streams. Its extent from N. to S. is 150 miles; that is, from lat. 38 to 40, 3. N. and from E. to W. about 120, or from long. 4, 40, to 6, 20, W.

The natives of Spanish Estremadura are laborious, and much addicted to tillage; being bold and warlike. The climate indeed is exceeding hot and somewhat sultry, as the country is mostly inland. Those dwelling at the foot of the mountains have good water; but in the plains there is great want of it; so that they are obliged to put up with what is gathered in certain pits dug in the ground. But in all other respects this may be justly reckoned the most pleasant and fertile country in the world; to instance only the famous plains of La Vera de Plasencia, where is the celebrated monastery of St. Justa, to which the emperor Charles V. retired after resigning his vast dominions in 1555.

The country is fruitful in corn, flax, wine, and fruit; especially abounding in excellent pastures; so that an uncommonly great number of cattle are driven from other provinces hither for fattening them, besides those belonging to the country. The banks of the Tagus and Guadiana, breed vast numbers of fine horses and mules, the former of which are highly prized throughout all Europe, and the latter in no small request over the whole kingdom.

Estremadura was a distinct province from all the rest of Spain, till in the preceding century it was annexed to New Castile, yet still it has a particular captain-general of its own. It contains seven cities, three bishoprics, many large and stately towns, with a great number of populous and wealthy villages.

ESTREMADURA, (province of,) in Portugal, or Portuguese Estremadura, a long strip of land along the sea-coast, from the mouth of the river Mondego, in a northerly direction, quite southwardly, below the town of Setuval or St. Ubes, extending from S. W. to N. E. about 110 miles, or lat. 38, 30, to 40, 10, N. Its breadth is near 50 miles, and in some places much narrower. Its utmost verge westward, is Cape la Roccos, commonly called the Rock of Lisbon; it lies under long. 9, 45, W. It is bounded on the N. by the river Mondego, which parts it from Beira, and on the E. by the same province also; on the S. it confines on part of Beira, and the province of Alentejo, and it has the ocean on the W.

The soil here is for the most part the very best in Portugal, and the climate very pleasant and mild, from its vicinity to the western ocean. It yields wheat and other grain, abundance of wine, oil, fruit, especially citrons, lemons, oranges, pomegranates, figs, dates, almonds, &c. Here several manufactures are carried on, and a much larger share of trade, than in any other province, from its sea-ports and neighbourhood to Lisbon, the metropolis of the province and kingdom. Here are three cities; namely, the last-mentioned and Leira, 111 towns, and according to an account taken in 1732, 315 parishes, containing 293,598 souls, exclusive of the eastern parishes. In this province runs the large river Tagus, which forming at Lisbon a secure harbour, and being also navigable a great number of leagues inland, empties itself into the sea.

The country between Lisbon and Abrantes is a perfect perfect paradise, on account of the beautiful plains, and great numbers of olives, and other fruit trees, with which that tract is filled. In this province they also make and export a great deal of sea-salt.

ESTREMOZ, a town of Alentejo, in Portugal, standing high, and is the best modern fortress in the kingdom, having double walls, defended with several high towers. It lies in a fruitful and pleasant county, and has a castle which looks like a citadel. The number of its inhabitants is 6500, in three parishes, with a house of mercy, an hospital, and six convents. Here is a curious manufactory of red earthen-ware, made into a variety of utensils.

In the neighbourhood are quarries of fine marble, which when polished, resembles alabaster; also a spring, which in summer turns several mills; but contrary to all others is dry in winter, and is said to incrustate wood with a stony substance. In 1663, the Portuguese, under count Schomberg, obtained a signal victory over the Spaniards near this place. It lies 26 miles W. of Elvas. Lat. 38, 44. N. Long. 8, 12. W.

ESWEGEN, in Hesse-Cassel, in Germany. See ESCHEWGEN.

ESTUQUE, a province of Africa, in Biledulgerid, inhabited by the Beriberes.

ETAPLES. See ESTAPLES.

ETHIOPIA, one of the divisions of Africa, which is farther subdivided by Ptolemy into Upper and Lower Ethiopia, though that excellent geographer does not seem to have known above half of it.

Ethiopia Superior, of which we have any certain information, contains Abyssinia, Nubia, and Abex, being bounded by Egypt, and the desert of Barca, on the N. by the Red-sea, and Indian ocean, on the E. by Anian, and the known parts of Africa, on the S. and by deserts and other undiscovered countries on the W. Abyssinia Proper has at present little or no commerce with the rest of the world; Abex, which runs along the coast of the Red-sea, being in the hands of the Turks. The river Nile issues from a lake almost in the heart of Abyssinia; and swelling with periodical rains, as is usual with all rivers lying under the tropics, overflows Egypt, and the low grounds on its banks, though the ancients were utterly at a loss how to account for this phenomenon. The increase of the flood is by the accession of the torrents, which precipitate from the numerous mountains in this country; though these are attended with this advantage, that the inhabitants of the Lower countries of Egypt, may remove hither in the hot season, and enjoy a cooler air, as they lie several degrees N. of Abyssinia.

The vallies are also rendered fruitful in grain and other productions, by the continual rains and inundations of the Nile, and plenty of gold is said to be found in its sands. But the Turks having shut up all the avenues leading into this country, no commerce can be carried on for this article. This country yields a great variety of camels, horses, asses, sheep, and other cattle. The Ethiopians are of a complexion quite black, having features more agreeable than their neighbours southward, and neither thick lips nor flat noses, as other Caffies have. Their sovereign was formerly absolute, but now the great men set up for princes in their respective governments, so that without them the king, called Prester John, can transact nothing of moment; and thus his power is extremely circumscribed, and is a kind of mixed monarchy. The Portuguese, at their first coming hither, observing that a cross was always carried before him, stiled him Priest, or Presbyter Maximus. In him was lodged all power, whether supreme, ecclesiastical or civil. According to others, the Turks gave him the title of Prester or Kan, i. e. King of Slaves, most of their negroes being purchased in this country.

The common people are all mere slaves, either to the prince or great men. Their religion is a kind of medley of Judaism and Christianity; but they adhere more to the Greek than the Latin church. They keep both the Jewish and Christian sabbath, baptizing and circumcising their children, and even the females. The king, through the persuasion of the Jesuit missionaries, once submitted to the pope's authority, which gave rise to an insurrection, so that he was obliged to expel the fathers, and restore their ancient rites and observances. It is thought that the queen of Sheba, in Solomon's days, came from this region, to hear the wisdom of that monarch, as also the prime minister of queen Candace, who was converted and baptized by St. Philip, a native of Ethiopia.

ETNA. See ÆTNA.

ETON. See EATON.

ETREES, a place just by Cressy in Picardy, in France, giving title of duke to a marshal of the French armies, who is at present one of the generals in Germany.

ETSCH, the same with the Adige, a river of Il Polesine di Rovigo, one of the territories belonging to Venice, in Upper Italy.

ETSED, or ECHET, a fortress of the Farther Circle of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary, which by reason of its site in swamps and morasses was impregnable; but in 1701, it was dismantled, together with Klein-Eched, or Little-Eched.

ETIFF, or EDIFF, (lough,) a lake in Argyle Proper, and western Highlands of Scotland, into which which the river Aw falls, about six miles below its issuing from Loughow; whence proceeding on it falls into the W. sea, opposite to the isle of Mull. It abounds with salmon.

EU, a town of Upper Normandy, in France; it is both a county and peerage, on the river Biesle, and English channel. It is the seat of a bailiwick, admiralty, forest-court, and salt-granary. Here is a collegiate church, three parishes, a college, an hospital, a priory, two convents, and two castles. Eu confines upon Picardy. It lies 20 miles N. E. of Dieppe. Lat. 50, 12, N. Long. 1, 36, E.

EU, (lough,) on the W. coast of Ross-shire, in the N. of Scotland. It is divided into two parts, the one a bay of the sea, abounding with herrings, which, besides those salted white for exportation, are generally dried in the smoke for home consumption; and the other a fresh-water lake, about nine miles where longest, and three where broadest. On its banks are large woods, and a good deal of iron is said to have been formerly made here; but whether any now, my author does not say.

EUBÆA. See ABANTIAS.

EVERDING, a town in the circle of Austria, in Germany. It lies on the S. banks of the Danube, 14 miles W. of Lintz. Lat. 48, 26, N. Long. 13, 54, E.

EVERNON, the capital of a duchy in Chartrai and Lower Orleanois, in France.

EVERDON, a village in Bedfordshire, not far from Tensford, on the E. It gave birth to the learned and eminent John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester, and Lord High-constable of England, in the reign of king Edward IV. and also to Sylvester surnamed of this place, who was bishop of Carlisle in that of the reign of king Henry III.

EVERSCHOP, or HEVERSCHOP, so called from the river Hever, a district in the western part of the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark, containing six parishes.

EVERSHOT, a market-town of Dorsetshire, not far from the source of the river Frome. It lies eight miles from Dorchester, and 131 from London. Here is kept an annual fair on May 12, for bullocks and toys.

EVESHAM, or EVESHOLM, Worestershire, commonly called Efam, is 95 miles from London, and 14 from Worcester, has a stone-bridge over the Avon, and a harbour for barges. It is an old borough, reckoned the second in the county, and had formerly an abbey with a mitred abbot. It was governed by a bailiff, till king James I. at the request of his son prince Henry, gave it a charter for a mayor, seven aldermen, 12 capital burgesses, a recorder, and chamberlain, who are all of the common council, with 24 other burgesses called assistants. Four of the aldermen, and the mayor for the time being, are justices of the peace, and of oyer and terminer, and of jail delivery, for all offences in the corporation, except high-treason; and the corporation has power to try and execute felons within the borough.

Here are two parish-churches, but the bells of both have been removed to a tower built here by one of the abbots. Its chief manufacture is woollen stockings. At the bridge-foot, in the parish of Bengworth, which is included in its jurisdiction, was a castle, which in 1157, was demolished. Here are corn-mills, a grammar-school, and a charity-school, the latter maintained by 1000l. This town is noted for the great victory obtained by prince Edward, afterwards king Edward I. over Simon Montfort, the great earl of Leicester, who was killed in the battle.

There is an open prospect from hence of the spacious valley called the vale of Evesham, which so abounds with the best of corn, as well as pasture for sheep, that it is reckoned the granary of all these parts, and runs all along the banks of the Avon, from Tewksbury to Pershore, and to Stratford in Warwickshire, and the river is so far navigable. Its markets are Mondays and Fridays; and its fairs on February 2, Monday after Low-Sunday, Whitsun-Monday, and Sept. 21.

EVERSLEY, a village in Hampshire, 8 miles N. of Farnham, with two fairs, on May 16, and October 18.

EUGABIO, GUBIO, also UGUBIO, in Latin, Eugubium, and anciently Iguvium, a small old city of Urbino, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy, yet contains 45 churches and convents, with some hospitals. It is the see of a bishop, suffragan to the metropolitan of Urbino, from which latter city it lies 38 miles S. It was very much damaged by an earthquake in the year 1751. Lat. 43, 31, N. Long. 13, 46, E.

EUGENE's (promontory,) or Eugene's mount, in the language of the country called Eugenius-hyge, a delightful hill in the Hither Circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, planted with vines and groves, upon that branch of the Danube which forms the isle of Csepel. The neighbouring pleasant and fruitful plain is about a mile in circuit, where besides is a castle that belonged to prince Eugene, also several huts or dwellings of peasants. The said prince, who took pleasure in residing here, had brought into the place a breed of fine Arabian sheep.

EVIAN, a town of Chablais, and duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy, on the S. shore of the Geneva-lake. It lies 50 miles N. E. of the city of the former name. Lat. 46, 30, N. Long. 6, 34, E.

EVORA, in very ancient times called Eborā, and and on account of the considerable privileges bestowed upon it by Julius Cæsar, had the name of Liberalitas Julia, afterwards Elbora, and at last its present name. It is a city, in the district of its own name, and the capital both of it and of Alentejo, in Portugal. It lies indeed not very high, yet is above the circumjacent spacious plain, almost furrounded with mountains, having mount Offa towards the N. and E. the mountains of Portel and Nianna on the S. and mount Mantemaro towards the W. It contains 12,000 inhabitants in five parishes. Besides the archiepiscopal cathedral, here is a house of mercy, a royal hospital, and several others, including within its circuit as well as neighbourhood, 22 cloisters, convents, and colleges.

In modern times it was begun to be fortified with 12 whole, and two half bastions; but these have not yet been completed. On the N. side is a quadrangular fort with four bastions, and the like number of ravelines, and is called Santo Antonio. To its metropolitan the bishops of Elvas and Faro are suffragans; and here is the seat of the Portuguese courts. Under its jurisdiction are 15 parishes, and here is an university. In 1680, the place surrendered to the Spaniards. It lies 68 miles S. E. of Lisbon. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 8, 26, W.

Of the same name is a town in Portuguese Estremadura, containing about 900 inhabitants.

EVORA-DE-MONTE, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, 15 miles from Ebor, and eight from Estremos, remarkable for a battle gained here by the Portuguese over the Castilians.

EUPHEMIA, (St.) one of those cities in the neighbourhood of mount Vesuvius, in the Farther Calabria of Naples, in Lower Italy, which in 1638 was swallowed up in a moment by an earthquake, and the space it occupied filled with a stinking lake. It gave name to the large bay upon which it lay. It lay 48 miles N. E. of Reggio. Lat. 39, 16, N. Long. 16, 28, E.

EUPHRATES, the finest river of Turkey in Asia. It issues from two sources northwards of Erzerum, in Turcomania, in lat. 40, 16, N. both which unite their streams three days journey below that city, to which place small vessels may come up; but its navigation is rendered dangerous by a very rocky channel. Its course at first is from E. to W. through Turcomania; but meeting with mount Taurus, it turns to the S. dividing that province from Natolia, and then running on S. E. separates Syria from Assyria. It afterwards passes through Eyraea Arabia or Chaldea; and having joined the Tigris, continues the same course to Bassora; 48 miles below which city it discharges itself into the

Vol. I.—No. 44.

Persian gulph. Mesopotamia or Padanaram is almost furrounded by the Euphrates and Tigris.

EUPHRATESIANA, was the name given to the kingdom of Antiochus, when, in the time of Vespasian, it was reduced to a Roman province.

EUPIN, or NEAU, the former name was given it by the inhabitants; though only a borough of Limburg in the Austrian Netherlands, it contains 4000 souls, and has a considerable trade, particularly in woollen cloths. It lies near the little river Weser, with a large wood in its neighbourhood, abounding with game. The country here stands so high, that snow is often seen in the beginning of summer, and in winter the roads are impassable. It lies six miles from Limburg to the N. and nine from Aix-la-Chapelle to the S.

EURE, a river of Normandy, in France, which rising in Great Perche, becomes navigable at Maintenon, and after receiving the rivers Aure and Iton, joins the Seine near Pont d'Arche.

Of the same name also is a river that runs by Rippon in Yorkshire.

EVREUX, anciently Mediolanum, so called from the Eburovici, corruptedly Ebroici, of itself a small city of Upper Normandy, in France, but has large suburbs, on the river Iton. It is the capital of a country belonging to the duke of Bouillon, the seat of a bishop, an election, and salt-granary. Its prelate is a suffragan to Rouen, has a diocese of 480 parishes, with a revenue of 20,000 livres per annum, and pays an acknowledgement to the court of Rome of 2500 florins. Here are nine parochial churches, two abbeys, and several convents. In this neighbourhood is the castle of Navarre. The cathedral of St. Mary has two fine towers.

The trade of the place consists in cloth, serges, and other woollen stuffs; besides linen, and a great deal of corn. From its counts descended Walter and Robert d'Evreux, earls of Essex, in England. It lies 28 miles S. of Rouen. Lat. 49, 21, N. Long. 1, 14, E.

EURIPUS, a famous strait lying between the isle of Negropont, in the Archipelago, and on the coast of Greece, in European Turkey, which opposite to the capital Egripos, is so narrow, that a row-vessel can hardly pass through; for which reason it is now joined by a bridge to the main land, as it was formerly by a neck of land. The Jesuit, Babin, has observed, that in the first eight days of the moon, as also from the 14th to the 20th inclusive, and in the three last days, the ebb and flood of this strait is regular, but all the other days of the moon these are irregular, as within 24 or 25 hours it has sometimes 11, 12, 13, and 14 tides, and then the water is half an hour in rising, and three three quarters in falling, but when regular, the tides are the same as in the ocean.

This irregularity, the cause of which has been in vain sought by the ancients and moderns, became proverbial among the Greeks: and it is said, that Aristotle precipitated himself into this gulph, as he could not assign a natural reason for the phenomenon. This ebbing and flowing is perceived ten or a dozen leagues off on each side of the strait, in several little bays along the shore, and that by the rising and falling of the water.

EUROPE, one of the grand subdivisions or quarters of the terraqueous globe, by the Romans called Europa, as it is now by the Italians and Spaniards, and Europe by the English and French. The Turks call it Rumeli or Alfrank, the Georgians Frankoba, and the rest of Asia Frankistan. On the N. it has the Frozen ocean or White sea; on the S. the Mediterranean sea, dividing it from Africa. On the E. it is bounded by Asia, from which it is parted by the Archipelago, the Euxine or Black sea, and the Palus Mœotis; and from thence, by a line drawn from the Tanais or Don, almost to the Oby in Muscovy: and on the W. it has the Atlantic ocean.

Europe extends itself between lat. 34 and 80, N. and between long. 5 and 80, reckoning the first meridian to pass through Teneriff. Its breadth as a continent, from the North Cape to Cape Matapan in the Morea, is about 2600 miles; and its length, from the mouth of the river Oby in the E. to Cape St. Vincent in Portugal W. about 2800.

Though Europe be the least of the four parts of this lower globe, it has much the advantage of the others with regard to the mildness of its climate, the fertility of its soil in general producing great plenty of corn, cattle, wine, oil, and in short, all things necessary, not only for the support, but ease and luxury of human life; more especially noted for the comeliness, strength, courage, ingenuity, and wisdom of its inhabitants, the excellence of their governments, equity of their laws, the freedom of their subjects; and, what surpasses all others, the purity of their religion, namely, the sublime doctrines of the great and divine law-giver Jesus Christ, and of his immediate apostles.

After the flood, Noah's posterity peopled Europe: but whether, as is generally believed, by the descendants of Japhet, who came from Asia Minor over the Hellespont into Greece, or those of Shem passing by land between the Caspian sea and Palus Mœotis, who went through Tartary and Scythia into Scandia or Scandinavia, and from thence spreading afterwards over France, Germany, &c. is not so clear. Europe, however, has for many ages been extremely populous, and some of her inhabitants illustrious for their courage, wisdom, and virtue: so that at different times they conquered by this means the greatest part of Asia and Africa, subjecting these countries to the two empires of Greece and Rome. And within these latter ages, namely, three or four centuries ago, almost one half of the earth formerly unknown, has been discovered by Europeans, and possessed by the colonies they have sent thither.

Christianity is professed throughout Europe, except in that part of it occupied by the Turks, who are disciples of Mahomet. But by reason of the corruptions and innovations gradually introduced into the church of Rome, the western church is divided: so that Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, part of Germany, and the Netherlands, with Poland, still follow the doctrine of the Romish church: whilst England, Scotland, Ireland mostly, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, great part of Germany, the Seven United Provinces of Holland, Switzerland, &c. have embraced the Reformation, and profess the Protestant religion. But in Russia, some few parts of Poland, in Walachia, Moldavia, Podolia, Volhinia, Greece, &c. the doctrine of the Eastern or Greek church is followed.

The Europeans have been most renowned for learning and arts; for they have brought all the sciences to a greater perfection than the Asiatics or Africans ever had done. Besides, the invention and improvement of many useful arts, particularly navigation, is entirely owing to the industry and genius of the inhabitants of this part of the world.

The languages of Europe are all derived from these six original ones, the Greek, Latin, Teutonic or Old German, Celtic, Slavonic, and Gothic: different combinations and dialects of which, with accidental additions, being the language of all the considerable parts of Europe, except Tartary and Turkey.

The dominions of Europe are principally monarchical, but under more gentle and easy forms than those of Asia and Africa, which make the subjects generally slaves, and the princes arbitrary.

The principal sovereignties of Europe are, the empires of Germany, Russia, and European Turkey; the kingdoms of Great Britain, (including England and Scotland) with Ireland, France, Spain, Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, Bohemia, Prussia, Sardinia, Naples, and Sicily, both which are stiled the kingdom of the Two Sicilies; the popedom of Rome; the republics of Venice, the Seven United Provinces of Holland, Switzerland, the Grisons, Genoa, Lucca, Geneva, Ragusa, and Marino.

Next to these may be reckoned the electorates of Germany, whose princes choose the emperor. Of these the three first are spiritual, and all the others temporal princes; namely, the archbishops and electorates of Mentz, Treves, and Cologne; the temporal electors are those of Bavaria, Saxony, Brandenburg, Palatine, Brunswick-Lunenburg, and the kingdom of Bohemia.

Besides these, there are no less than 300 subaltern sovereignties in Germany, Italy, &c. whose possessors, whether spiritual, as archbishops and bishops; or temporal, as princes, langraves, dukes, marquises, counts, &c. though tributaries to the emperor, or some other superior prince; yet have authority and territorial jurisdiction within their own respective estates.

Of the spiritual, the most considerable are, the grand master of the Teutonic order, the grand master of Malta, the grand prior of Malta, also styled the grand prior of Germany; the archbishop of Salzburg, and 20 bishops in Germany; the abbot and princes of Fulda, St. Gall in Switzerland, and some few more.

Of the temporal, the most considerable are, the archduke of Austria, the grand duke of Tuscany, the langraves of Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Reinfels, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Hesse-Homburg, the dukes of Savoy and Modena, &c. in Italy.

The duchies of Milan, Mantua, and Mirandola, belonging to the house of Austria; the duchies of Parma and Placentia, in the possession of the son of don Philip of Spain; the dukes of Mecklenburgh, Wirtemburgh, Holstein, Saxe-Weymar, Eysenach, Gotha, &c. in Germany; and the duke of Courland, in Poland.

The princes of Anhalt, Aremberg, Hohenzellern, Nassau, and East-Frieland, Furstenburg, Lichtenstein, Waldeck, Tour, and Taxis, &c. also in Germany.

The marquises of Baden-Baden, Baden-Dourlach, Brandenburg, Cullembach, and Brandenburg-Anspach, in Germany.

The counts of Hanau, Solms, Traun, Schliek, Staremburg, &c.

Besides these, are the kan or cham of European Tartary, the hospedars of Walachia, Moldavia, &c.

EUROTAS, the ancient name of a river in the Morea, in European Turkey; its present name is Basilopotamo, i. e. the royal river. It falls into the Golfo di Calochina.

EUSDALE, a pleasant valley watered by the Eus, and a subdivision of the shire of Teviotdale or Roxburgh, in the S. part of Scotland. The most remarkable place in it is the castle of Langham.

EUSTACE, or EUSTACIA, an island on the coast of Florida, in North America, from which in 1740, the English bombarded the castle and town of St. Augustine; but doing little or no execution, they raised the siege soon after, and reimbarked.

EUSTATIA, (St.) or EUSTATHIUS, one of the Caribbee islands. It is about five leagues in circuit, is properly a very steep mountain, which seems to rise out of the sea in the shape of a sugar-loaf. It is situated in the Atlantic ocean, in America, five miles W. from St. Christopher's; is a very fine, well cultivated island, lately subject to the Dutch, and something larger than Saba, which had the same masters, between which and St. Christopher's runs a narrow channel. It has no harbour, only an open road on the W. side. Its principal product is tobacco, which is planted all round the mountains, by the Dutch; who were well fortified here; and have 1000 white people, besides 1500 negroes: they produce near 60,000 lb. of sugar here. With regard to situation, it is reckoned the strongest of all the Caribbee islands, here being only one good landing-place, which may be easily defended by a few men; besides, the harbour is commanded by a fort, mounted with guns: only the very top of the mountain is covered with wood, all its circuit else being manured and planted. Though the said top looks as if it was barren; yet on it is a pretty large plain, where wild beasts harbour. Though in this island are neither springs nor rivers, they never want proper supplies of water from their ponds and cisterns. In the island is only one church; but several store-houses, well furnished with all necessaries, particularly the commodities of Europe. The air here is healthy; but subject to terrible thunders, earthquakes, and hurricanes: the last of which generally happen in the months of August and September, to the frequent ruin of their houses, plantations, and ships. It is said that even the birds, foreseeing, by instinct, the approach of these hurricanes, lay themselves flat on the ground; and the rain which precedes them is always bitter and salt.

The Dutch took possession of this island in the year 1635, the property of which the states granted to some merchants of Flushing, who soon settled a colony on it of about 600 families, or, as some say, 1600 persons. In 1665, the English, from Jamaica, turned the Dutch out; but it was soon re-taken by the Dutch and French, then united in war against the English; and the French placed a garrison in it. But by the treaty of Breda it was restored to the Dutch. In 1689, it was taken from them by the French; and from these it was taken the very next year by the English, under Sir Timothy Thornhill, having had only eight of his his own men killed or wounded in the attack, though the fort was mounted with 16 great guns, and surrounded with a strong double pallisado, and defended on one side by a deep ditch, and a narrow bridge over it to the gate, which admitted but one man at a time. The island being again restored to the Dutch, by the treaty of Ryfwick, they remained in quiet possession of it till 1781, when the English took possession of it, till the French surprised it the same year. Here they have very fine fields of sugar-canes. This island, as well as Curassoa, is engaged in the Spanish contraband trade, for which, however, it is not so well situated. The island lies in lat. 17, 29; long. 62, 56.

EUSUGAGUEN, a strong town of Africa, in the kingdom of Morocco, and in the province of Hea. The inhabitants are the most brutal of all Barbary, and their trade consists in wax and honey.

EUTIN, or UTIN, a place of Holstein, in Germany, giving title of duke to a younger branch of the Holstein family; here is a seat, with a lake and park. It lies 16 miles from Lubeck.

EUXINE SEA, or BLACK SEA, the Latin Pontus Euxinus, a vast collection of water, the boundary, as far as it goes, between Europe and Asia. It is about 700 miles long from E. to W. and has a perpetual current running into it from the Mediterranean through the Bosphorus, or Strait of Constantinople, and no visible outlet, and yet the waters are not higher at one time than another, nor have they any discernible flux or reflux. See BLACK SEA.

EWANCZITZ, a town of Moravia, in Germany, at the confluence of the rivers Igla and Of-law, which lose their names in that of Schwartz. Here were Lutherans, Hussites, Calvinists, and many more sects: so that the Romanists, by reason of this diversity, easily drove them all out, except the Jews, who are still tolerated. It lies 10 miles S. W. of Brin.

EWEL, a town in Surry, with a market on Thursdays; and two fairs, on May 12, and October 29, for horses, bullocks, sheep, and toys. It is 10 miles N. E. by N. of Darking, and 14 S. E. by S. of London. Long. 0. 12, E. Lat. 51, 25, N.

EWHURST, in Surry, near Okeley, and the borders of Suffex, has its name from the abundance of yew-trees there formerly. A fair on July 25. Here is a charity school.

EX, a river that rises in a barren tract of land, called Exmore, in Somersetshire; and after being joined by several little streams, runs by Tiverton, where there is a stone bridge over the river. About nine miles below Tiverton, it is joined by a pretty large stream called the Colompton; and about two miles lower, by another stream formed by the junction of the Horton and Credy. With these additions, it washes the walls of Exeter. At Topsham, about four miles below Exeter, it receives another considerable addition to its stream; and two miles farther it is joined by the Ken; and falls into the ocean at Exmouth, after a course of about 40 miles. Ships of great burden go up to Topsham, from whence vessels of 150 tons are conveyed to the key at Exeter, by means of an artificial canal. We have already observed, that the Ex is navigable for vessels of considerable burden to Topsham. The passage, however, at the mouth of the river, is but narrow, having rocks on the E. side, and broad sands on the W. nor is the water on the bar more than six or seven feet deep at low water, but the tide rises 14 or 15 feet, so that it is deep enough at high water. When ships are within the bar, they may ride afloat at a place called Star Cross, about a mile and a half from the river's mouth; but those that go to Topsham, lie a-ground on the ooze at low water.

EXETER, in Devonshire. It is 78 miles S. W. of Bristol, 108 from the Land's End, 31 N. N. E. of Dartmouth, 49 S. S. E. of Barnstaple, 44 N. E. of Plymouth, 88 W. S. W. of Salisbury, and 172 from London, has part of a long bridge over the Ex, with houses on both sides, and another has lately been erected from the bottom of the principal street of the city, which has a communication with a remaining part of the old bridge, so as to form two entrances into the city. It is the Isca of Ptolemy and Antoninus. It is the see of a bishop, transferred hither from Crediton, by Edward the Confessor, and one of the principal cities in the kingdom for its buildings, wealth, and number of its inhabitants. It is, with the suburbs, three miles in compass, and had six gates, besides many turrets. It had formerly so many convents, that it was called Monckton, till king Athelstan changed its name to Exeter. Besides chapels, and meeting-houses, there are now 16 large churches within the walls, and four without. St. Peter's, the cathedral, is a magnificent, curious fabric; which, though near 500 years in building, looks as uniform as if it had but one architect. It has a ring of 12 bells, reckoned the largest in England; as is also its organ, whose largest pipes are 15 inches in diameter; and it is common to see hundreds of people there, at the morning service at six o'clock in summer, and seven in winter. This city has had divers charters granted, or confirmed, by most of our kings, but it was made a mayor town in the reign of king John, and a county of itself by king Henry VIII. It is governed verned by a mayor, 24 aldermen, four bailiffs, a recorder, chamberlain, sheriff, town-clerk, &c. They have a sword-bearer, and four stewards, four sergeants at mace, wearing gowns, and staff-bearers in liveries with silver badges. The magistrates and freemen, who choose its members to parliament, are at least 1500.

It had anciently a mint; and in the reigns of king William III. and queen Anne, many pieces of silver money were coined here, which have the letter E, under the bust. Here are 12 or 13 incorporate city companies. All pleas and civil causes are tried by the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common-council, but criminal causes, crown causes and those relating to the peace, are determined by eight aldermen, who are justices of the peace. Here are four principal streets, one whereof is a grand one, called High-street, all centering in the middle of the city, which is therefore called Carfox, from the old Norman word, Quatre voix, (i. e.) the four ways. Near it is a conduit, lately removed from the centre to the side of the principal street, which was first erected by William Duke, mayor of the city, in the reign of Edward IV. and there are others well supplied with water, brought in pipes from the neighbourhood. There is an old castle in the N. part of the city, called Rougemont, from the red soil it stands on; from whence there is an extensive prospect from the walls. It is supposed to have been built by the West-Saxon kings, and that they resided here, as did afterwards the earls and dukes of Cornwall. The old palace has been lately entirely demolished, and an elegant sessions-house erected, where the assizes, quarter-sessions, and county-courts are held. Within the castle is an old chapel.

In the city and suburbs are prisons both for debtors and malefactors, a workhouse, almshouses, and charity schools, and in 1741, an hospital was founded here, for the sick and lame poor of the city and county, upon the model of the infirmaries of London and Westminster. Vessels of 150 tons come up to the quay. It has markets on Wednesdays and Fridays; and fairs on Ash-Wednesday, Whit-Monday, Aug. 1, Dec. 6, but Lammass fair is the greatest, and lasts three whole days, and two half-days. Great trade is carried on here for serges, perpetuanas, long-ells, and other woollen-goods, in which it is computed, that at least 600,000l. a year is traded for here; yet no markets were erected here for wool, yarn and kerseys, till the 30th of Henry VIII.

Before that time, the merchants drove a considerable trade to Spain and France; and the latter were incorporated in the reign of queen Mary I. by the name of "The governor, consuls, and society of merchant-adventurers trading to France." Here is a weekly serge market, said to be the greatest in England, next to the Brigg market at Leeds, in Yorkshire; and that some weeks, as many serges have been sold here as amount to 80,000l. or 100,000l. for, besides the vast quantities of their woollen goods shipped for Portugal, Spain, and Italy, the Dutch give large commissions for buying up serges, perpetuanas, &c. for Holland and Germany.

It is particularly remarked of this city, that it is almost as full of gentry as of tradesmen; and that more of its mayors and bailiffs have descended from or given rise to good families, than in any other city of its bigness in the kingdom, for the great trade and flourishing state of this city tempted gentlemen to settle their sons here, contrary to the practice of many of the inland as well as the northern counties, where, according to the vain and ruinous notion of the Normans, trade was despised by the gentry, as fit only for mechanics and the vulgar. The city was under the jurisdiction of the Romans, whose coins have been dug up in and about it. After they left England, the Saxons drove the Britons out of it into Cornwall, and encompassed it with a ditch and a stone-wall, (which still remains entire) besides bulwarks. The Danes attacked and spoiled it in 875; and afterwards in revenge of the general massacre of the Danes by the English, Swain, one of their kings, came hither with a great navy, put the men to the sword, ravished the women, massacred the children, burnt the city, and damaged the walls.

A long time after this, just as it was reviving, William the Conqueror besieged and took it; and it was again besieged in the reigns of king Stephen and Edward IV. In the reign of Henry VII. it was again besieged by Perk' n Warbeck, and battered furiously, but the citizens forced him to raise the siege, which so pleased the king, that he came hither, and presented a cap of maintenance to the city, and gave the very sword from his side to be borne always before the mayor.

In the reign of Edward VI. in July 1544, it was smartly cannonaded by the rebels of Cornwall and Devon, who almost starved it, by breaking down its bridges, cutting off its water, and stopping up all passages; but it held out till the lord John Russell came with a force, and raised the siege on the 6th of August, which was then appointed as an anniversary day of thanksgiving by the city, and is still observed as such, when a sermon is preached on the occasion by the mayor's chaplain.

King Charles I.'s queen, to whom this city gave shelter in the civil wars, was here delivered of Henrietta, afterwards duchess of Orleans; whose picture is in its Guildhall, as are also general Monk's, George I's. lord Camden's, and Mr. Heath's, their late town-clerk. In short, Exeter, by a constant adherence to its motto, Semper fidelis, has been applauded by all historians, for its inviolable fidelity to its sovereigns, whether they held their crown by hereditary or parliamentary right. The list of members returned for this city to parliament, begins at the 22d of Edward I.

EXETER, a town in the province of New-Hampshire, in New-England, and on the W. branch of the Piscataqua river.

EXETER, a town in the county of New-Hanover, in N. Carolina, situated on the N. E. branch of Cape Fear river, about 30 miles from Wilmington, and 22 from the New-river.

EXMORE, where rises the river Ex, is a filthy barren ground, near the Severn, part in Devonshire, but more of it in Somerset. Here are some very high hills; and on the top of one of the highest is a plain, near one mile in diameter, full of little springs. In this moor are several monuments of antiquity, viz. stones in triangles and in circles; and of late years several urns, with Roman coins in them, and some Greek have been found in digging the barrows.

EXMOUTH-BAR, Devon, about three leagues to the northward of Torbay, is very dangerous, and not to be attempted by any but those who are exceedingly well acquainted; the going in is very narrow, having rocks on the E. side, and sand on the W. side. At low-water there are but 6 or 7 feet on the bar; but at high water 16 and 18. Here are always pilots ready to come off. Being over the bar, there is a place called Star-cross, where ships commonly ride afloat in 10 and 12 feet at low water. Opposite is the village of Exmouth.

EXILLES, a small town of Piemont, in Upper Italy, and on the confines of Dauphiny, in France. It has four bulwarks, and a strong mountain castle in the valley of Oulx, and on the N. shore of the Doria. The duke of Savoy took it from the French in 1708, had it confirmed to him by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, and he is still in possession of it. It lies 14 miles W. of Susa. Lat. 45, 12. N. Long. 7, 10, E.

EXUMA-ISLE, one of the Bahama-isles, situated on the E. of the Great-bank, between Stocking-isles on the S. W. and Long-isle on the E. it is now uninhabited, except by a few families, yet is one of the best of the Bahamas, not only for its fertility, but for the excellency of its anchoring-places in the sound to which it gives name, where all the British navy could ride in safety. The only sugar plantation which has ever been attempted here, was abandoned last war. It lies under the Tropic of Cancer. Long. 74, 30. Lat. 24, 30.

EXUMA-SOUND, lies E. of the Great Ba-hama-bank, between it and the isle of Guanahani. Lat. 24. Long. 75.

EYE, or AYE, a borough of Suffolk, in a sort of island, for so its name imports, formed by a brook, on the confines of Norfolk, and in the road betwixt Ipswich and Norwich. It is governed by two bailiffs who return two members to parliament. The principal manufacture here is bone-lace and spinning: its church is large, and here is a charity-school. It gives title of baron to the earl of Cornwallis. It lies 25 miles N. E. of Bury St. Edmund's, and 92 from London. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fair on Whitfun-Monday.

Of the same name is also a river in Berwick-shire.

EYMINGE, a village in Kent, with one fair, on July 5.

EYMOUTH, so called from the confluence of several rivulets near it, which a little lower fall into the Leina, the capital of Grubenhausen, belonging to the elector of Hanover, in Brunswick in Germany. It is well fortified, and in a fine corn country; it has five gates with a raveline to each, a rampart, and a double ditch. It has three churches and a town-house. It has been often taken and retaken in the civil wars, drives a good trade in beer, which is in great request, but was more so before the sweet malt-liquor brewing came so greatly in vogue. It lies 20 miles N. of Göttingen.

EYMOUTH, or AYMOUTH, a town on the mouth of the Eye, in the shire of Berwick, and S. division of Scotland, with a harbour for fishing vessels, and the place mostly inhabited by fishermen. Here was formerly a fort to curb Berwick; and the French held it in queen Elizabeth's reign, but not long, as being commodious for landing their supplies for the Queen-Mother. At this place is plenty of claret very cheap, and excellent fish. It lies three miles E. from Ayton, and on the confines of that large waste, called Goldingham-moor.

EYNDHOVEN, or EYDENHOVEN, the capital of Kemperland, in Brabant, and the Dutch Netherlands, on the river Dommel. It formerly belonged to the prince of Orange, king William III. It lies 18 miles above Bois-le-duc, to the S. Lat. 51, 40. N. Long. 5, 26, E.

EYRACA, or IRAK-ARABIE, the ancient Chaldaea or Babylonia, in Asiatic Turkey.

EYRAC, or IRAK-AGEM, the ancient Parthia, now the principal province of Persia, in Asia; lying almost in the heart of the empire. It is bounded on the N. by Ghilan and Adirbeitzan, on the E. by Chorazan, on the S. by Chosistan and Faristan, and on the W. by Curdistan, the ancient Assyria. Its capital is Isfahan, the metropolis of all Persia. The famous Kouli Khan was a native of Parthia.

EYRAKBACKE, or OREBACKE, a staple town in the isle of Iceland, in Norway, both for fish and flesh.

EYRESCOURT, a pretty thriving English plantation, in the county of Galway, and province of Connaught in Ireland, not far from the Shannon.

EYSENACH, or SAXE-EYSENACH, duchy of, in Thuringia, and Upper Saxony, in Germany. It lies W. of that of Gotha, and confining on Hesse. It is subject to its own duke.

EYSENACH, pretty little city belonging to the duchy of its name last mentioned, on the river Nesa, which falls a little lower into the Werra or Hoafet. It has a Latin-school; from hence to the abbey of Fulda, the roads are extremely bad. Here is a considerable trade in iron, of which there are mines not far off. The duke sometimes resides here but more frequently at Markshall, a fine castle five leagues from it. It lies 48 miles W. of Erfurt. Lat. 50, 51, N. Long. 10, 18, E.

EYSENARTZ, near the river Saltza, which falls into the Ens, a town of Upper Stiria, and circle of Austria, in Germany, famous for its iron-mines and forges, whence it has its name. They are said to have been worked above these 1000 years, without any sensible decay, employ 19 mills on two little rivers and a vast number of labourers, who supply the country, and all Germany besides, with their steel. Here is an annual fair, where hemp, leather, tallow, and all necessaries, are exchanged for their iron and steel. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Leuben.

EYSENBACH, a well-built town of the Hither circle of the Danube, in Lower Hungary, belonging to the town of Schemnitz. It famous for its excellent warm baths, whose hot water is conveyed through wooden channels from the springs, for the distance of about 350 paces to the bathing rooms; yet retains a middling warmth. The water is of a petrifying quality, with a red sediment. It lies six miles from Schemnitz, and about four from Glashtuten.

EYSENBERG, (county of,) a small territory of the Wetteraw, in Germany. It confines on those of the Wied and Sayn, and bailiwick of Monthabor, belonging to the elector of Treves, between whom and the prince de Chimay it is shared.

EYSENBERG, a large open town of the last-mentioned county of the same name, on a hill, with a princely seat, in a famous old fort belonging to its count. In this hill are several mines, principally of iron, whence the name. It lies on the river Seyne, near Colbach, and three leagues from Coblenz.

EYSLEBEN, so called from its iron or iron-ore, the capital of Mansfeldt, in Upper Saxony, in Germany, near the lake called Sulfsee, or Sweet-lake. This place is noted for the birth of the famous reformer, Martin Luther, in 1483, and for his death in 1546. The town suffered much in the wars between the emperor Henry IV. and the Saxons, in the eleventh century, as also in the 30 years civil wars of Germany. It has a good citadel, and profitable quarries of black stone, with two annual fairs. Its prince has a seat here, and a vote in the general diet.

EYTON, a large village of Berwickshire, in the S. of Scotland, with a seat of the earl of Home in it, and has one annual fair. It stands on the same river as EYMOUTH, which see; with a bridge over it.

EZIZA. See ECYA.

EZAGUEN, a rich and ancient town of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez, and in the province of Habat; seated in a fertile country, 57 miles from Fez.

EZERO, a town of Thessaly, in Greece, formerly a bishop's see; seated on a small lake of the same name, between the gulph of Armiro, and town of Larissa.

EZZAB, a province of Africa, in the kingdom of Tripoli, which produces excellent saffron.

FAABORG,

F.

F A

FAABORG, a town of Funen, in Denmark, on the southern sea-coast; it lies in a low and fruitful spot. A good trade is carried on here in corn and all sorts of provisions, though the harbour but indifferent. Here is a pretty good hospital. It has suffered much from accidental fires, and from burning and plundering by the enemy. Not far from hence, at the church of Horne, is a ferry to the isle of Alsen; and in the bay near the town are several small islands.

FABRIANO, is indeed only called a village of Ancona, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy; yet it shews more than many towns can, containing two collegiate churches, 17 convents, 16 churches of ecclesiastical fraternities, two infirmaries, three hospitals, and without the place 12 churches more. It is famous for its paper.

FACKEBERG, a high promontory in the S. district of the isle of Langeland and Funen, in Denmark.

FAENZA, in Latin, Faventia, was an ancient city of Gallia Cisalpina; now a town of Romagna, in the Ecclesiastical State and Middle Division of Italy, on the river Amone, from which, in the upper part, runs a channel that goes through the town, and below it falls into the same river again. Over this is a stone-bridge built with towers, after crossing of which you come into a suburb something strong; but the fortifications of the town are not inconsiderable. It is the see of a bishop, suffragan to Ravenna. In its fine market-place is a beautiful marble fountain, and famous all over Italy for the good earthen-ware made here in great quantities. Bastard porcelain is called Faience from it. The Goths formerly laid waste this town. The emperor Frederic II. took it after a long siege, and built a citadel in it; yet it recovered its freedom, and maintained it till subjected by the Manfredi. As pope Alexander VI. procured the last of that family to be taken off in the year 1500, the town fell under the dominions of the republic of Venice; but in 1509 the French took it, and afterwards gave it to Pope Julius II. It lies 34 miles E. of Bologna. Lat. 44, 34, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

FAIRBACH, a village of Caermarthenshire, in S. Wales, with one fair, on Nov. 22, for cattle, horses, and pedlars wares.

FAIFO, or HAIFO, is the chief place of Cochinchina, and where they hold their fair, on a bay, in lat. 16. long. 108, 30. The king formerly gave leave to the merchants of China and Japan to build a city here, which is divided into two parts, each under its own government and laws. Some call it Haifo, and place it in the province of Caccian or Cacciam, and say it is the principal port frequented by foreigners, there being a fair here for about four months every year, to which the Chinese import vast quantities of plate, as the Japanese do of silk, from which the king draws a large revenue by customs and imposts, and the people reap vast profit. The bay it stands on has two inlets from the sea, one called Pullu-campelo, and the other Turon or Touran, which are at first three or four leagues from one another, till having run seven or eight, they join in one stream, where the vessels that come in both ways meet.

When the Dutch first came hither, the Portuguese at Macao sent an embassy to the king of Cochinchina, to desire him to exclude them; but the Dutch having landed while the ambassador was at court, and sent presents, the king granted them a free free trade, and ordered them to land their goods against the fair. But, while they were on the river in boats, the king's galleys destroyed most of them, alledging, the Dutch were notorious pirates, and he forbade them his country any more. On the other hand, he offered the Portuguese three or four leagues of the fruitfulest country for building a city.

FAIRFORELAND, a promontory on the coast of Colerain, in the N. of Ireland, between which and the point of land, called the Mull of Kintyre, in Scotland, is only 15 or 16 miles; and the countries can be plainly seen from each other.

FAIR, (Isle), a small island lying between Orkney and Shetland, 10 or 12 leagues E. N. E. from the former; and seven, eight, or ten leagues S. W. from the latter. It is three miles long, and scarce half a mile broad, very craggy, with three high rocks which are visible both from Orkney and Shetland. There is in this island a small quantity of arable land, which is very fruitful and well manured; and there might be considerably more, but the inhabitants are obliged to reserve it for peat and pasturage. They have, for the size of the island, a great many sheep, and those very good and fat: but they have no kind of moor-fowl or other game, but there is great plenty of sea and water fowl, and all kinds of fish upon their coasts. There is in effect no port, though they have two that are nominally so: one at the south end, which is full of rocks, where only small boats can lie, and that but indifferently; the other at the north-east end, larger and safer in summer, so that it serves commodiously enough for their fishery. The duke of Medina-Sidonia, when commander of the famous Spanish armada in 1588, was wrecked on the east coast of this island. The ship broke to pieces, but the duke and 200 men made their escape. They lived here so long, that both they and the inhabitants were almost famished. At length the duke and the poor remains of his people were carried to the main land of Shetland, and then to Dunkirk, by one Andrew Humphry, for which service Andrew was rewarded with 3000 merks. This island produced to its former proprietor between 50l. and 60l. sterling. It was sold at Edinburgh on the 20th of June 1766, for about 850l. to James Stewart, of Burgh, esq.

FAIRFIELD, a county on the coast of Connecticut, in New England, in North America; which, with Newhaven, forms that called the Newhaven colony, which is united to that of Connecticut. It was formerly the Mohegin territory, and partly planted by the Dutch, New York province, bounding it all along on the S. It has Newhaven on the N. E. and New York on the S. W. The inland part, about eight or ten miles from the shore, is full of hills and swampy grounds, which are uninhabited, but used to have good game and a fur trade. The villages, there being no town here, are built near small creeks; but are not considerable for any trade or business.

Among these is one of the same name, 21 miles S. of Boston, which was destroyed by the British troops, July 6, 1779. Lat. 41, 16, N. Long. 72, 12, W.

FAIRFORD, though a small market town of Gloucestershire, is famous for a great many medals and urns dug up near it, where are several barrows, the monuments of the slain interred here. Through the place runs the river Coln, a little above its influx into the Thames, and over it are two large bridges. Its church, built by Mr. Tame, a merchant of London, having a fine tower, is remarkable for the curious painted glass in its windows, in number 28, which glass was taken in a prize-ship bound for Rome. The painting, being scripture stories both of the Old and New Testament, was from the designs of Albert Durer: and the colouring in the drapery, and in some of the figures, is so well executed, that Vandyke affirmed the pencil could not exceed it. Mr. Tame, the founder, who died in 1500, lies buried on the N. side of the church, under a raised marble monument. It lies 20 miles from Gloucester, and 81 from London.

FAIRHAVEN, mentioned in Acts xxvii. 8. is reasonably supposed to be the same with, or at least a part of, that coast of Crete which is called by Stephanus, the Fair Shore or Coast. He tells us there was a city or great village adjoining, which is without doubt that in the abovesaid text called Lasea. But it seems, by ver. 12. this was not a commodious haven to winter in, notwithstanding its fair name.

FAIR PROMONTORY, according to Polybius, lay N. of, and near to, Carthage. The Carthaginians, in their first treaty with the republic of Rome, in its birth, allowed not the Romans to sail beyond it, i. e. to the S. of it, not caring their coasts should lie open to all comers, lest the fruitfulness of the land, and the happy situation of the cities, should tempt them to settle there.

FAISAN, or FASSAN, an inland province of Africa, lying S. of Tripoli, between it and Sara or the Desert. It is under its own particular government.

Among its many cities and towns is its capital, which is of the same name, and which De l'Isle places S. of Mount Atlas. The country abounds in dates, and the inhabitants drive a good trade, especially in negro slaves.

FAITH, (St.) a little village lying N. of the city of Norwich, in Norfolk, remarkable, for 10 M the

the Scottish drovers bringing their black cattle for the Norfolk graziers to buy, who feed them in the marshes of this county, mostly between Norwich, Beccles, and Yarmouth, and in winter on their sandy lands, upon turneps; the beef of which is so delicious, that the inhabitants prefer them to the English cattle, though larger. Of these Scots runts there are upwards of 40,000 head fed in this county every year. And another advantage is, that their dung is such good manure to the land, that they always have good crops of corn afterwards, and the price of their acres by this means raised from five to 20 shillings.

FAISANS, or PHEASANT ISLE, the French call it L'Isle de la Conference, and De Paix. It is formed by the river Bidosoa, dividing France from Spain, a little to the S. of the city of Fontarabia, in Biscay Proper, and near that of St. Jean de Luz, in Gascony, in France. As it belongs to neither kingdom, it has been pitched upon for concluding several treaties between these two crowns; particularly that of the Pyrannees, from its being in the neighbourhood of the mountains of that name, in the year 1659: and also for the several matches between both kingdoms, as that of the Infanta Maria Theresa with Lewis XIV. and the exchange of the Infanta Maria Anna Victoria, with Mademoiselle de Montpensier, the duke of Orleans' daughter, in the year 1722, this being a neutral island, the sole dominion of which neither kingdom can claim. It lies 16 miles S. of Bayonne. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 1, 34, W.

FAKENHAM, or FALKENHAM, a market-town of Norfolk, which formerly had salt-works. It lies 18 miles from Norwich, and 111 from London. A fire here in 1738 burnt 26 houses.

FALAISE, so called from the rocks surrounding it, a town of Lower Normandy, in France, on the river Ante. It is the seat of an election, bailiwick, salt-granary, and a subordinate forest-court. Here are two parochial churches, two convents, an abbey, and two hospitals. It has a strong castle upon a rock. It was one of the last places the English subdued in this province, and also one of the last that surrendered to king Charles VII. in the year 1430. Here are three suburbs, one of which, called Guibray, is famous for a fair kept here in August ever since the Conqueror's time. The town is surrounded with large moats and two ponds. The Conqueror's mother, Arlotte, was born in this place. In the suburbs and neighbouring villages they manufacture light woollen stuffs, fine linen, laces, &c. for which they have a pretty good trade, and the country around produces plenty of corn. It lies 18 miles S. of Caen. Lat. 48, 58, N. Long. 0, 18, W.

FALBYGDEN. See FALCOPING.

F A

FALCONERA, a fortress on the eastern coast of Val di Noto, and island of Sicily, in the lower division of Italy, a little above the mouth of the river of its name, about eight miles eastward of Noto. Lat. 36, 50, N. Long. 15, 33, E.

FALCOPING, or FALKOPING, a provincial town of West Gothland, in Sweden, lying almost in the heart of it, in a fruitful spot, but quite divested of wood, between two mountains, and on the S. bank of a little lake, which empties itself into the river Lida. In its neighbourhood was fought a battle in 1388, between king Albert and queen Margaret, in which the former, together with his son, were taken prisoners. The country round the town is called Falhygden. It lies 20 miles N. from Skara.

FALEZIN, a town of Walachia, in European Turkey, on the river Pluth, where a battle was fought, and also a treaty of peace concluded, between the Russians and the Turks, in the year 1711. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 26, 49, E.

FALKENBERG, a small, but ancient, maritime town, of Halland and South Gothland, in Sweden, near which the river of its name, or Falkenbers-a, also called Aethra, issuing from the Alsung lake, empties itself into the sea. It lies in a sandy spot: here is a considerable fishery of salmon, but that of herrings is small. The harbour here is tolerable, and defended by a castle; it is the 97th town in the order of the diet.

Near the village of Axtorn was fought, in 1565, the battle of Falkenberg, as it is called, in which the Danes were beaten by the Swedes. It lies 18 miles N. W. of Helmstat. Lat. 57, 10, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

FALKENBURG, a strong castle of the New Marck of Brandenburg, in Germany, on the river Frage or Rega. It lies 49 miles N. E. of Stetin. Lat. 53, 39, N. Long. 16, 12, E.

FALKENSTEIN, (county of), in Lorrain. It was formerly an Imperial fief; but the emperor Frederic of Austria gave, in 1458, the feudal jurisdiction of it to the ducal house of Lorrain; to whom also the property of this county was sold, in 1667, by count William of Falkenstein. As the duke ceded Lorrain to France in 1736, this was excepted, and remains still in his possession.

FALKIOPING. See FALCOPING.

FALKIRK, a town of Stirlingshire in Scotland, situated in W. long. 3, 48, N. lat. 56, 20. It is a large ill-built place, and is supported by great fairs for black cattle from the Highlands; it being computed that 24,000 head are annually sold here. A great deal of money is also got here by the carriage of goods landed at Carron wharf to Glasgow. This town is remarkable for a battle fought fought in its neighbourhood between Edward I. of England and the Scots, commanded by the Steward of Scotland, Cummin of Badenoch, and Sir William Wallace. The latter had been invested with the supreme command, but perceiving that this gave umbrage to the nobility, he resigned his power into the hands of the nobleman above mentioned, reserving to himself only the command of a small body who refused to follow another leader. The Scots generals placed their pikemen along the front, and lined the intervals between the three bodies of which their army was composed, with archers: and dreading the great superiority of the English cavalry, endeavoured to secure their front by pallisadoes tied together with ropes. The battle was fought on the 22d of July 1298. The king of England divided his army likewise into three bodies; and by the superiority of his archers, defeated the Scots with great slaughter. Wallace alone preserved entire the troops he commanded; and retiring behind the Carron, marched leisurely along the banks of that river, which protected him from the enemy. In this battle fell John de Graham, a gentleman much celebrated for his valour, and stiled the right-hand of the gallant Wallace. His epitaph is still to be seen on a plain stone in the church-yard of Falkirk. On the 18th of January 1746, a battle was fought here between the king's forces commanded by general Hawley, and the Highlanders headed by Charles Stuart. The former was seized with a panic, and fled; but Colonel Husk with two regiments, who kept their ground, prevented the Highlanders from pursuing their victory. Extensive ruins are perceived in the neighbourhood of this town, supposed by some antiquarians to have been the capital of the Pictish government; but others believe them to be the remains of some Roman stations.

FALKLAND, a small town of Fifeshire in Scotland, made a royal burgh by James II. in 1458. Here stood one of the seats of the Macduffs, earls of Fife. On the attainder of Munro Stewart, the 17th earl, it became forfeited to the crown in 1424. James V. who grew very fond of the place, enlarged and improved it. The remains evince its former magnificence and elegance, and the fine taste of the princely architect. The gateway is placed between two fine round towers; on the right hand joins the chapel, whose roof is of wood, handsomely gilt and painted, but in a most ruinous condition. Beneath are several apartments. The front next to the court was beautifully adorned with statues, heads in bass-relief, and elegant columns, not reducible to any order, but of fine proportion, with capitals approaching the Ionic scroll. Beneath some of these pillars was inscribed J. R. M. G. 1537: or Jacobus Rex, Maria de

Guise. This place was also a favourite residence of James VI. on account of the fine park and plenty of deer. The east side was accidentally burnt in the time of Charles II. and the park ruined during Cromwell's usurpation; when the fine oaks were cut down in order to build the fort at Perth.

At this place king James was, when Mr. Carey, an Englishman, brought him the news of the death of queen Elizabeth, and for which he created him viscount Falkland, which dignity is still enjoyed by his posterity, and that as premier viscount of Scotland. King Charles I. was also here, having modelled the chapel according to the church of England form; and once it was the most in request of all the royal palaces in Scotland.

FALKLAND ISLAND, visited by commodore Byron in 1765, is surrounded by several others; the whole together supposed to be little less than 700 miles in circumference, situated in lat. 51, 6, S. Long. 65, 0, W. It is distant from the continent of South America 250 miles. The harbours are large, and well defended by several small islands most happily disposed; and even the smallest vessels may ride in safety in the creeks, while fresh water is easily to be obtained, as the small rivers which descend from the mountains discharge themselves into the sea. And notwithstanding there were no trees growing on the islands when discovered in 1594, those planted since have thrived surprisingly well. The soil yields naturally water-creases, sorrel, wild parsley, maiden-hair, and celery. Sea-lions and seals are the only amphibious animals found in these parts; but there are great variety of fish on the coasts. The only quadrupede is a species between the fox and wolf. The islands and their coasts produce an incredible number of land and water fowl, among which are swans, falcons, hawks, eagles, owls, and geese of several kinds, and a variety of aquatic birds.

These islands were first discovered by Sir Richard Hawkins in 1594, who named them Hawkins's Maiden-land. In 1700, Gouin, a French commander, came to an anchor on these islands; and in 1764, Mons. Bougainville made a settlement on them, which he relinquished to the Spaniards in 1767.

Agreeable to the ideas of lord Anson, that the British nation ought to have a port in the South seas to refit their ships, in case of a war with Spain, Lord Egmont, when at the head of the admiralty, ordered a fort to be built on this island, which was named after him, in order to form a settlement; claiming a right on account of the island being first taken possession of by one Falkland, a native of Great Britain. But the Spaniards claiming a right to it, on account of their being in possession session of the whole continent, sent a small armament, which took possession of the fort, &c. the 24th of June, 1770. However, on a remonstrance being sent to the court of Spain, they were obliged to make reparation for the affront. But the British garrison entirely quitted this settlement in April 1773.

FALLEN CITY, or OLD JERUSALEM, a range of rocks among the Virgin Isles in the West Indies, S. W. of Virgin Gorda. Long. 62, 53. Lat. 18, 10.

FALLERNE, a famous medicinal spring of Smoland, in East Gothland, in Sweden, about half a mile from Wexio.

FALMOUTH-TOWN and HARBOUR, in the island of Antigua, in the West Indies. It lies on the S. side of the island, and is defended by two forts, which have a magazine.

FALMOUTH, a small town in the county of York, and province of Massachusetts bay, in New England, which was destroyed October 18, 1775, by the British forces, for refusing to supply stores when demanded. It consisted of 600 families, and was divided into three parishes, New Casco, Sapwood, and Stroud Water. The principal part of the town was situated on a neck of land stretching out E. from Stroud Water, and formed a kind of mole to the little cove within it. This part consisted of a church and town-house, with about 112 houses. It was laid out in lots forming two streets parallel to the harbour, and five at right angles to them; on which a great number of buildings were carrying on. The harbour was extremely fine, large and commodious, and masts and naval stores were loaded here. There was much trade carried on from thence to the West India islands, and many ships were built here.

FALMOUTH, a town and bay, at the S. W. extremity of the peninsula in Barnstable county, Plymouth Colony, New England, 16 miles S. W. from Sandwich, and five N. E. from Nauset-haven, at the mouth of Buzzard's bay, one of the Elizabeth-islands.

FALMOUTH, a town in King George's county, in Virginia, on the N. side of the Rappahannock river, five miles N. of Fredericksburg, and 29 S. of Dumfries.

FALMOUTH, Ptolomy's Ostium Cenionis, a mayor-town of Cornwall, the richest and best trading place in it, and larger than any three boroughs that send members to parliament, though it sends none. It lies at the mouth of the Fale, which discharges its waters into the English channel. It has a very commodious harbour, ships of burthen coming up to the very quay, and such shelter in the many creeks belonging to it, that the whole royal navy may ride safe here which way soever the wind blows. The entrance to it is covered by the castles of St. Maws and Pendennis, both which have governors and garrisons.

The trade of Falmouth has greatly encreased since the establishment of the English packets between this place, Portugal, and the West Indies, as also between it and Groyne in Spain; these from Portugal bringing over not only vast quantities of gold in specie or in bars, for the Londoners, but the Falmouth merchants themselves trade with the Portuguese in ships of their own, and have a great share in the profitable pilchard-fishery. Here is the custom-house for most of the towns in the county; and a head collector resides at Falmouth. It lies 12 miles from Truro, and 264 from London; the distance between it and the Groyne 400. Annual fairs are held here on July 27, and October 10, for horses, oxen, sheep, cloth, and hops. Lat. 50, 12, N. Long. 5, 12, W.

FALSE-BAY, lies between the Cape of Good Hope, on the W. side, and False Cape, on the E. side. The distance between these two Capes, which forms the opening of the Bay, is about 5 leagues, and its extent to the N. near 6 leagues.

FALSTER, (island of,) in the diocese of Funen, in Denmark. It is much of the same nature with that of Lapland. It lies at the entrance of the Baltic, about a large mile from Seeland, and six from Warnemunde, in Mecklenburgh, stretching southward to the neck of land called Gedfers Odde. Its length is almost six miles, but its breadth on the N. end 14, and on the S. hardly four miles. It may be called the orchard of Denmark; and its capital Nycoping (Nyekiobing.) Dr. Heylin styles the Naples of Denmark. It abounds very much with wild game. This island belongs to the queen dowager; it consists of the baliwic of Nyekiobing; and is divided into two districts; namely, the southern, consisting of 13 parish-churches, and the northern, of 15.

FALSTERBO, a noted place of Scania, in Sweden, for the herring-fishery. Here is also a light-house on account of the shallows called Falsterbo-ref.

FALTSCHII, a town of Moldavia, in European Turkey, on the river Pruth, in the neighbourhood of which you meet with the ruined walls and foundations of houses in the midst of the thickest woods, and those in a strait line, which probably are the remains of the ancient large city of Taiphali, mentioned by Herodotus, on the site of which Flatschii was built.

FALUN, a copper-mine town, and district of Dalecarlia, in Sweden Proper, between the two lakes of Warpan and Runn, and also between two mountains. It is large, and one of the richest among the mine-towns. The houses are all of wood, with regular streets; one of the market-places is spacious and beautiful. On the N. side of it is a large stone-building, where the courts are held, besides a public cellar, corn-granary, and dispensary. On the E. side is a large stone-church, covered with copper, with brass gates and turrets, one of which is very high. Without the town eastward is another church of stone, and covered also with copper. Here is a good free-school, a considerable copper-staple, or copper-yard, and subordinate mine-courts, &c. The governor of the place resides near the town. This is the 15th town in the order of the general diet. On the W. side is the considerable copper-mine well known of old, the annual produce of which is sometimes 20,000 pounds of copper, and in the year 1750 it yielded 20,321 pounds. It is 350 Swedish ells deep. In this town are made all sorts of curious copper-works.

FAMAGUSTA, or ARSINOË, a city and seaport, on a fine plain on the eastern coast of the island of Cyprus, in Asiatic Turkey. Here is a good safe harbour, though not large, which is defended by two forts upon two opposite capes. The sea surrounds the town on two sides, as do walls, bulwarks, and a ditch on the other two. The harbour opening into Tripoli in Syria, south-eastward, is covered by two rocks, between which is a passage about 40 paces broad, and shut up every night with a chain.

The Turks have built a stout castle for the defence of this place, and keep its other fortifications in good repair. Its governor is independent of the basha of the island, and is obliged to maintain a galleys for the public service at his own cost. Here is a Greek bishop, subject to the metropolitan of Nicosia. This place was forced to surrender to Solyman II. after a vigorous defence, and 10 months siege; but he caused the Venetian governor to be dead alive, and massacred the inhabitants in cool blood, though they had made an honourable capitulation. Its fine churches have been turned into mosques; the Christians, who are allowed to keep shops here in the day-time, must retire at night to some of the neighbouring villages, which are very numerous.

The country round this place is fertile, and the sea supplies it with all necessaries both for life and delight. It lies 17 miles E. of Nicosia, and 28 W. of Tripoli in Syria. Lat. 34, 49, N. Long. 36, 12, E.

FAMINE-PORT, a fortress on the N. E. of Magellan Straits, in S. America. It had its name from a Spanish garrison, which was famished to death here. Since that time no colony has been settled so far southward. Lat. 54, 5, S. Long. 80, 10, W.

FANANO, a small town of Modena Proper in Upper Italy, where are medicinal waters. It lies 30 miles S. of the city of Modena. Lat. 44, 29, N. Long. 11, 24, E.

FANO, anciently Fanum Fortunæ, also Colonia, or Julia Fanestris, a town somewhat strong, in the duchy of Urbino, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, on the sea, with a harbour for small vessels. It is the see of a bishop, immediately under the pope. Here reside many noblemen, and the number of its churches and convents is reckoned at 44. The greatest curiosity in this place, was a triumphal arch of marble erected in honour of Augustus Cæsar; but very much damaged by a cannon-ball, whilst the town was besieging in 1458. The parts about Fano are extremely delightful. It lies 20 miles E. of Urbino city. Lat. 44, 10, N. Long. 14, 22, E.

FARA, though small, yet a fruitful and pleasant island of the Orkneys, in the N. of Scotland.

FAREHAM, a market-town of Hampshire, 10 miles from Southampton, and 75 from London. Its annual fair is on June 29, and market on Wednesday. Here is a good charity-school.

FARELLONS, an island of Africa, in Negroland, 15 miles in length, where there is plenty of fruits and elephants. Long. 11, 47, W. Lat. 6, 48, N.

FAREWELL, (Cape,) the most southerly promontory of Groenland, at the entrance into Davis's Straits. Lat. 59, 37, N. Long. 44, 30, W.

FARGEAU, an ancient town of France, in the diocese of Auxerre, and principal of the diocese of Puisaye, with a strong castle, and the title of a duchy, 10 miles S. E. of Briare, and 90 S. of Paris. Long. 3, 10, E. Lat. 47, 40, N.

FARLEY, a village in Staffordshire, six miles N. of Uttoxeter, with two fairs on March 21, and October 10.

FARMINGHAM, a town in Hertford county, Connecticut, N. of New Cambridge, and W. of Hertford in New England.

FARN-ISLANDS, two groupes of little islands and rocks, 17 in number, lying opposite to Bamboorough-castle in Northumberland. At low-water, the points of several others are visible besides the 17 just mentioned. The nearest island to the shore is called the House-island, and lies exactly one mile and 68 chains from the coast. The most distant is about seven or eight miles. They are rented for 16l. per annum: their produce is kelp, feathers, and a few seals, which the tenant watches and shoots for the sake of the oil and skins. St. Cuthbert is said to have passed the two last years of his life on the House-island. A priory of Benedictines was afterwards established here, for six or eight monks, monks, subordinate to Durham. A square tower, the remains of a church, and some other buildings, are still to be seen on this island; and a stone coffin, which is pretended to have been that of St. Cuthbert's.

At the N. end of the isle is a deep chasm, from the top to the bottom of the rock, communicating with the sea; through which, in tempestuous weather, the water is forced with great violence and noise, and forms a fine jet d'eau of 60 feet high. It is called by the inhabitants of the opposite coast, the Churn. One of the islands in the most distant groupe is called the Pinnacles, from some vast columnar rocks at the S. end, even at their sides, flat at the tops, and entirely covered with guillemots and flags. The fowlers pass from one to the other of these columns by means of a narrow board, which they place from top to top, forming a narrow bridge over such a dreadful gap that the very sight of it strikes one with horror.

FARNESE, a town in the duchy of Castro, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy.

Of the same name are two places in Rome, called the Great and Little Farnese, with curious paintings and furniture, particularly in the former.

FARNHAM, a village in Dorsetshire, 10 miles S. E. of Shaftsbury, with a fair on August 21.

FARNHAM, in Surry, 12 miles from Guildford, and 41 from London, in the Winchester road, is a large populous town on the Wey, supposed to have its name from the fern which abounded here, and is the capital of the hamlet of its own name. It was given by the West-Saxon king Ethelbald, to the see of Winchester, whose bishops have generally resided in the castle here, in the summer time, ever since the reign of king Stephen, whose brother, its then bishop, first built it. It was a magnificent structure, with deep moats, strong walls, and towers at proper distances, and a fine park; but it is much decayed.

The town, which has many handsome houses, and well-paved streets, is governed by 12 masters or burgesses, of whom two are bailiffs, (chosen annually,) who act under the bishop of Winchester, have the profit of the fairs and markets, and the assize of bread and beer, and hold a court every three weeks, which has power of trying and determining all actions under 40s. From Michaelmas to Christmas there is a good market for oats; and one of the greatest wheat-markets in England, especially between All-saints day and Midsummer, when 250 loads one day with another, nay, sometimes 400 loads have been sold in one day. The Hampshire white wheat, which is sold here, is counted the best for meal, but Sussex for weight and spending. The toll-dish here was once reckoned worth 200l. a year; but it is much diminished, since the people about Chichester and Southampton began to send their meal to London by sea. But this loss is amply made up by the vast growth of hops here, of which there are 300 or 400 acres of plantations about this town as fruitful as any where, and they are said to outdo the Kentish hop-yards, both in quantity and quality. On the other hand it is observed, that this nursery has quite supplanted the clothing-trade, and thrown numbers of the poor upon the parish, who used to be employed in spinning, weaving, &c. The church here was formerly but a chapel of ease to Waverly-abbey. This town sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward II. but never since. The magistrates have their privileges from the bishop of Winchester, to whom they pay an acknowledgement of 12d. a year. The market is on Thursday; fairs, Holy-Thursday, June 24, and November 2. Here are a free-school and charity-school, and a great market for Welsh hosiery.

FARO, one of the five secure harbours in the island of Siphanto, in the Archipelago, and Turkey in Europe.

FARO, an audience or district of Algarve, in Portugal, in which is a town of the same name, in Latin, Pharus; it is fortified in the modern taste, stands upon a plain, in a bay which forms a harbour, and defended by a castle. A narrow channel, commonly called Baretta, separates it from Cape Santa Maria, Pliny's Promontorium Cuneum. It contains 4500 inhabitants, has two parish-churches, one of which is the cathedral. Its see, which was first at Ossonoba, afterwards at Sylves, was at last translated hither. Here are four convents, &c. The town is subject to the queens of Portugal, and in its districts are contained eight parishes. It lies on the S. coast, about mid-way between Cape St. Vincent and the mouth of the Guadiana, and 24 miles E. of Lagos. Lat. 36, 48, N. Long. 9, 12, W. It received great damage by the earthquake, Nov. 1, 1755.

Of the same name is a place in Alentejo, but inconsiderable.

FARRO, CAPO DI FARO, or CAPO DELLA TORRE DI FARO, anciently Promontorium Pelorum, a noted promontory in the island of Sicily, and Lower Division of Italy.

FARO-HEAD, the W. point of land opposite to Dungby-head, in Caithness, and the N. of Scotland. The E. point, or Dungby-head, Camden calls Virvedrum Promontorium, and the W. point, or Faro-Head, Sarvedrum Promontorium. Hence the vast Western or Atlantic ocean appears, but geographers have not yet agreed upon a name for this particular part, there being no country to derive it from.

FARRAR, a river of the Ard, N. W. of Inverness, ness, near the mouth of which is the village of Beaulieu, formerly a rich and pleasant abbey, and in the estate of the late unfortunate lord Lovat. It is famous for its salmon-fishery, and falls into the frith of Beaulieu, a branch of the Murray-frith.

FARRINGDON, or FARRINGTON, a market-town of Berkshire, pleasantly situated on a hill near the river Ouse. Here is a large church, and the town is governed by a bailiff. It has a good weekly market on Thursday; its annual fairs are on February 2, and Whitsun-Tuesday. It lies 26 miles from Reading, and 65 from London. Here are the ruins of a castle.

FARSISTAN, sometimes called Fars, a province of Persia, in Asia, and the ancient Persis. It is bounded on the S. by Persian Irak, has Khufestan with part of the Persian gulph or Bassora on the S. and Keresan with part of Segestan on the E. In this province Larestan, as well as the isle of Ormus are included; which are commonly reckoned to belong to Farsistan, the Persians having conquered them. Its principal town is Schinas.

FARTACK, or FARTACKI, a kingdom of Arabia Felix, in Asiatic Turkey. It is variously placed by geographers, by some along the sea coast, by others in the inland. The latitude it is also differently given. However, since so many geographers and historians have mentioned it as an inland kingdom, it is not improbable but that it may extend itself mostly inland; though it is scarcely to be doubted but that they had also some places on the coast, since we find the city and Cape Fertack in it. Though the Grand Signior receives a tribute from all the parts of Arabia Felix; yet he exempts this from it, only that they are obliged to furnish him with 5000 men whenever called upon, which yet are to be maintained at the charge of the Porte. Of the city of Fertack we know very little, nor is it mentioned by any Arabic geographers.

FAST-CASTLE, formerly a strong fort on the point of the promontory called St. Ebb's Head, in the shire of Berwick, which belonged to the earl of Hume; only its ruins are now remaining.

FATAPOUR. See FETIPORE.

FAVAGNANA, a small island of Italy, about 15 miles in compass, seated on the western side of Sicily, with a fort called fort St. Catharine. Long. 12, 55, E. Lat. 38, 0, N.

FAUCIGNY, or FOSSIGNI, in Latin Tractus Focimacensis, a district of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It runs along the foot of the Alps, between the county of Geneva on the W. of which it was anciently a part, and the county of Valais on the E. It had for some time its own lords; but in the year 1200 it descended by marriage to the count of Savoy. In 1659 it was re-united to the duchy of Savoy, and has continued so ever since, only that it has passed to and from the hands of the French.

FAUSTINOPOLIS, anciently a city in Cappadocia, so called from Faustina, daughter of the emperor Antoninus, and wife to M. Aurelius. She was a very lewd woman, and yet he not only made the village where she died a city and colony, and called it as above, but erected a temple in it to her honour, which was afterwards consecrated to Heliogabalus, the most lewd and debauched of all the Roman emperors. The senate, out of flattery to the emperor, ranked among the goddesses a person unworthy of a place among women.

FAYAL. See FYAL.

FAYENCE, a town of France, in Provence, near the river Biafon, 10 miles from Grasse, and 15 from Frejus. Long. 6, 47, E. Lat. 43, 44, N.

FE D'ANTIOCHIA, Santa, the most northern town of Popyan, a district of Terra Firma. It is situated about 200 miles to the N. of Popyan city, near the confines of the province of Carthagea, on the banks of the river Santa Martha, and near 180 miles to the S. of its conflux with the Magdalena. Thither the inhabitants removed from another town called Antiochia, which was 15 leagues distant from it; and now but small, and thinly peopled; whereas Santa Fe d'Antiochia is a considerable place, being the capital of a government called the audience of Santa Fe. This town had the addition of Antiochia annexed to it, to distinguish it from Santa Fe de Bogata, in South America.

FE, or Foy, Santa, a place in the middle of Veragua, a province in the audience of Guatemala, where the king of Spain keeps officers for casting and refining gold. It stands at the source of a river which runs into the North sea.

FE, Santa, the capital of New Mexico. It is situated 130 leagues from the sea, near the source of Rio del Nort, which running a great way through the country southward, and then bending east, falls into the gulph of Mexico. Baudrand makes it nine leagues from that river. It is said to be a rich city, regularly built; and is the see of a bishop, who is suffragan to Mexico, as well as the seat of the governor of the country, who holds his post for five years, and is then succeeded by another. By some it is called Santa Fe de Granada, and by others New Mexico. Lat. 7, 29. Long. 77, 20.

FECKINGHAM, a village in Worcestershire, seven miles S. E. of Bromsgrove; with two fairs, on March 26, and September 30.

FELIN, a town of Livonia, with a castle, formerly merly belonging to Sweden, but now subject to Russia. It lies on a river of the same name, issuing from the Wortzy-lake; it suffered greatly in 1560, and at other times during the war between both crowns. It lies 112 miles N. E. of Riga. Lat. 58, 50, N. Long. 25, 58, E.

FEIRA, or FYGERIA, a small maritime town on the coast of Portugal, between Lisbon and Oporto, at the mouth of a river which permits vessels of 100 tons burthen to come up to the town, the chief trade being in salt and oil, the former of which is made near this place; and the adjacent country abounds in olives. There is an inconsiderable castle, with a few guns for its defence.

FELKIRK, or FELDKIRK, a town of a county of the same name in Tirol, and circle of Austria, in Germany, on the E. banks of the Rhine, 38 miles S. E. of Constance. Lat. 47, 20, N. Long. 9, 36, E.

FELLETIN, a town of Upper la Marche, on the river Creuse; it lies 18 leagues above Argenton to the S. It trades in cattle, and has a manufactory of tapestry.

FELLS, so they commonly call in Westmoreland any waste or mountainous ground; in particular, a chain of almost impassable hills on its W. side, confining on Cumberland: they also call it Fourness fells, from the promontory of the former name in Lancashire, that runs S. into the Lea. The high grounds about Appleby are called Roman-fell, Meel-fell, and Hellbeck-fell; the latter of which is a quarter of a mile above Brough.

FELTRE, FELTRI, or FELTRIA, a small town of Feltrino, and marquisate of Trevigiana, one of the Venetian territories, in Upper Italy, upon a mountain near the river Piava, and is the see of a bishop, under Aquileia. It lies 38 miles N. of Padua. Lat. 46, 12, N. Long. 12, 20, N.

FEMERIN, an island of Denmark, near the coast of Wagria, in Holstein, from which a strait not above a mile in breadth, called Femmer-fund, divides it: though but a small spot, it has always been looked upon as one of the keys to Denmark with regard to Germany. This island is very fruitful in corn and pasturage, and yet contains but two parishes, Borg and Peterdorp. At the landing-place from Holstein, there is a fort. It suffered much in the wars, especially in 1419, when king Erick of Pomerania laid it almost waste. It is now subject to Denmark. Lat. 54, 56, N. Long. 11, 12, E.

FENESTRANGE, a town of Lorraine, and capital of a district of the same name, seated on the river Sarre, 17 miles from Marsal, and 17 S. of Deux-Ponts. Long. 7, 11, E. Lat. 28, 52, N.

FENESTRELLE, a fortified town of Piemont in Upper Italy, on the river Cluson. In 1708 the duke of Savoy took it; and is one of the strongest frontiers against France. Lat. 45, 10, N. Long. 7, 26, E.

FERABATH, a city of Ghilan, one of the provinces of Persia, in Asia, on the S. shore of the Caspian sea. A river about 40 paces broad rising in the mountains, passes by the town. Here Abbas the Great had a palace, with noble furniture, and a fine garden. The country round it has a rich soil. The place is surrounded with moats. It lies 146 miles N. E. of the city of Ghilan. Lat. 38, 12, N. Long. 50, 10, E.

FERDEN, or VERDUN, a city in a territory of the same name, belonging to Lower Saxony, in Germany, on the river Aller. The late elector of Hanover, George I. king of Great Britain, purchased it of the king of Denmark, who took it from the Swedes. It lies 28 miles S. E. of Bremen. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 9, 10, E.

FERE, (La), a town of Upper Picardy, in France, in a marshy bottom, at the junction of the rivers Sene and Oise. Though fortified, the Spaniards took it during the civil wars; but Henry IV. recovered it in 1597, after an obstinate resistance. It has been dismantled; its sole defence now is a sluice, which can lay the whole country for a mile round under water. At a powder-mill here they make, it is said, 120,000 lb. of powder every year. It lies 46 miles S. E. of Amiens. Lat. 49, 45, N. Long. 3, 26, E.

FERE, with the addition of Champenoise, a small town of Upper Champagne, in France. It lies 34 miles N. of Troyes. Lat. 48, 44, N. Long. 4, 8, E.

FERENTINO, anciently Ferentinum, celebrated by Horace, &c. a small episcopal city of the Compagna di Roma, and Ecclesiastical State, in the middle Division of Italy. It stands high, on the confines of Naples, 21 miles S. E. of Palestrina, and 54 E. of Rome. Lat. 41, 48, N. Long. 14, 15, E.

FERETTE, a town of Alsace, now subject to France. It lies 49 miles S. of Strasburg. Lat. 47, 27, N. Long. 7, 36, E.

FERMANAGH, (county of,) in the province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is bounded by Donnegal and Tyrone on the N. by another part of Tyrone and Monaghan on the E. by Cavan and Leitrim on the S. and by another part of Leitrim and the ocean on the W. Here is no market-town, and only one borough, namely, Inniskilling.

This county is 38 miles long, and 24 broad: it is full of woods and bogs, a third part of it being covered by lough Erne, the largest lake in this part of

of the kingdom. It is full of well-inhabited isles, abounding with salmon, trout, &c. About the middle the waters contract into the breadth of an ordinary river, continuing so for six miles; on which narrow part stands a strong fort, being the only pass from the N. part of Ireland to the S. This fort, with the town, is called Inniskilling.

FERMENTERA, and SERMENTERA, formerly Ophiusa, one of the two Pityusan or Pine islands, in the Atlantic ocean, and on the coast of Spain; about six miles from the other called Ebusus or Ivica, three miles one way, and five the other, but uninhabited.

FERMO, anciently Firmium Picenum, a well-built and well-inhabited city of the marquise of Ancona, and Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy, upon a hill, with a harbour, on the Adriatic sea. An archbishop resides here; and this was the native place of Lactantius, from it surnamed Firmianus, 32 miles S. of Ancona city, Lat. 43, 10. Long. 15, 10.

Of the same name is another town under the name Monte Fermo, in contradistinction from that last mentioned, which is called Porto Fermo, and but three miles asunder.

FERNANDES, or JUAN FERNANDES, two islands in the Pacific ocean, on the coast of Chili, in South America. The one, as lying farther W. is called De Aufera; and the other, as nearer the land or to the eastward, De la Tierra. The former, above a league in length, is very high land, with several cascades; one of which, on the S. W. side, precipitates itself with such impetuosity into the sea, that its froth may be seen, says Ulloa, at three leagues distance. It lies about 3, 27, W. from Callao. The distance between both islands is 34 leagues. The island De Tierra, which is about 440 leagues N. of Cape Horn, is between three and four leagues from E. to W. most highlands; with some plains, but a part of the mountains themselves full of excellent timber, and several streams of very light water. Here are great numbers of goats, but very difficult to come at, as living among inaccessible crags and precipices. The mountains in this island are of a great height, and every part of them covered with a grass or straw higher than the usual stature of a man.

When captain Carteret visited this island in 1766, he found the Spaniards had fortified it. A house and four pieces of cannon were observed near the sea side; and on the brow of a hill, at a small distance, was a fort with Spanish colours. He saw cattle on the hills, and about 20 houses on different parts of the island. In another part of the island he saw a guard-house, with cannon mounted.

In this island are three bays, those on the W. and E. for small vessels; but that on the N. E. side, properly called Juan Fernandes, consists of a bay exposed to the N. and N. E. winds, and 50 fathoms deep within two cables length of the shore. This bay is visited by all European ships that go into the South seas, in order to refresh their crews after a long voyage and weathering the dangers of Cape Horn, supplying them with fruits, herbs, and provisions. Accordingly, in the year 1741, admiral Anson put in here for repairing his ships, and recovering his sick men.

On this island captain Woodes Rogers found one Alexander Selkirk, a native of Scotland, who had lived there alone four years and four months, having been left by his ship: from hence Daniel Defoe is thought to have taken the first hint of his famous novel of Robinson Crusoe. The editor of lord Anson's voyage places this island in lat. 33, 40, S. and 110 leagues W. from the continent of Chili. Here are great numbers of sea-wolves or sea-lions, and abundance of fish, with some kinds peculiar to those seas.

FERNES, an inland town in the county of Catherlough, and province of Leinster, in Ireland; it is the see of a bishop united with that of Leighlin. It is eight miles from Enniscorthy.

FERNSTEIN, or FREYENSTEIN, a town of Austria, in Germany, on the S. side of the Danube; though small, has a magnificent castle, besides the ruins of an old one. Here Richard I. of England was confined prisoner on his return from the Holy land. It lies 60 miles W. of Vienna.

FERO, or FARRO, Islands. These are 24, belonging to Denmark, and lie between 61, 40, and 62, 20, N. lat. and between 6, 10, and 7, 30, long. W. of London. They stretch in length about 60 miles, in breadth 40; and have Norway on the E. Shetland and Orkney S. E. Scotland and the Western Islands S. and Iceland and Greenland N. W. and N. They are high rocks in the sea, covered with thin earth, and divided from one another by deep and rapid streams. In the valleys the mould is about two feet thick, and produces plenty of grass and corn. Their sheep feed in the valleys and on the hills all the year round, but black cattle only in summer. Part of these islands are inhabited, and part left for pasturage. The most remarkable are these: 1. Fugloe, 1 e. Foul Island, lies farthest to N. E. three miles long and two broad. 2. Swinhoe, two miles to S. from Fugloe. 3. Videroe, three miles from Fugloe to W. and one from Swinhoe, five miles long, and three broad. 4. Bordoe, S. W. and W. of Videroe and Swinoe, about six miles from N. to S. and four broad. 5. Kunoe, three miles long, and one broad. 6. Kalfoe, two miles miles W of Kunoe, and larger than that. 7. Osteroe, W. of Kalfoe and Bordoe, 12 miles long but unequal in breadth. 8. Nelfoe, two miles S. from Osteroe, three miles long and half as broad. 9. Stromoe, the largest, 17 miles long, and eight broad, lies to W. of Osteroe and Nelfoe. It has several harbours and creeks, &c. 10. Waagoe, above one mile from Stromoe to W. and is 6 miles long, and four broad. 11. Miggeneis lies two miles hence to W. three miles long, and one and half broad. 12. Kolter, three miles from Waagoe to S. E. two from Stromoe W. one mile and a half long, and half a mile broad. 13. Sandoe, two miles from Stromoe to S. seven miles long and four broad. 14. Skuoe two miles farther S. three miles long and one broad. 15. Store Diemen, or Great Dam, 2 miles to S. E. of Skuoe, one mile in diameter. This is encompassed with cliffs, and has but one passage to it, and that difficult, for but one man at a time to enter, so that it might at small expence be made impregnable, since ships cannot lie near it because of the strength of the currents, nor could they be famished, as the isle affords cows, sheep, and fowl. 16. Little Diemen, two miles S. E. from the other. 17. Suderoe, two miles S. from the last, 14 miles long and six broad. On the E. it has four creeks, one of them a little harbour. There are other rocks called holmes, which are left for pastures; and there are several rocks which rise out of the sea near the islands, two of which it is necessary for mariners to know. One N. of Fugloe, is called the bishop, round, and pretty high, the other, near the S. E. of Suderoe, is a high round rock called the Monk, near which is a dangerous whirlpool, which, in calm weather, draws ships towards it and often sinks them. But they sometimes escape by driving with the stream. When the sun is in Cancer there is no night in these islands for a whole month, the sun going but a few degrees under the horizon; and in mid-winter they have but little day. But the dawning and twilight are pretty long for the same reason.

In the longest day the sun rises seven min. after two in the morning, and sets 53 after nine; which makes the day 19 hours and 46 min. by which it appears that these islands are situated as before said, partly in the 15th and partly in the 16th climates. From the setting to the rising of the sun in the longest day, it is but four hours 14 min. during which there is no difference to be perceived between day and night; for the sun being then but 4, 29, under the horizon, cannot make any difference for a whole month, there being then but little difference in the sun's declination; so that from August 17, when the sun comes 18 deg. under the horizon, they have no considerable night. In the shortest day the sun rises 53 min. after 9 in the morning, and sets seven min. after two in the afternoon; so that there is but four hours 14 min. day. But the dawning and twilight add much to it, so that something of day is to be perceived at eight in the morning, and lasts till four at night. The currents between the islands run very strong, and in several manners, according to their situation. The wind against the tide in winter occasions a turbulent and terrible sea.

There are three streams that turn round, and are very dangerous, sinking every thing that comes near and throwing it up again at a distance. The most perilous is that which lies S. of Suderoe, near the Monk, which has swallowed up several ships. The sea round this whirlpool is 80 or 90 fathoms deep, where the sea runs quiet and still. A little farther in, the ground lies from 25 to 30 fathoms deep, where the sea begins to rise and turn round. Farther in the ground lies but from 8 to 10 or 12 fathoms deep, snail-wise, in a circle four times round. This high ground has points or cliffs on the top about 8 fathoms deep, and about 10 or 12 distant from one another; so that when a vessel comes upon this uneven bank, it is turned round those cliffs, by the stream, with so much swiftness, that people not used to it lie down to avoid being giddy, and the vessel is turned round all the four circles; between which there are three channels or conduits, where the sea runs about slowly in small turnings.

On the E. side is a gulph, where the sea runs in as through a sluice; and works but slowly within. On the top of the Monk the air is so excessive cold in the hottest day in summer, that the people who climb it for fowl, are scarce able to endure it, and the fowls which breed there are little more than feathers. One might wonder, after such a frightful account of the danger from this whirlpool, how such particular description could be taken; but our author informs us, that when the weather is calm, the sea still, and the stream in the reflux, the inhabitants venture to fish there, and to climb the rock.

These islands abound with fountains of wholesome water, of a good taste. Some of them are on the tops of the highest mountains, and constantly run in the greatest drought; so that scarce a cottage but has the convenience of a spring or brook, the water of which is generally cooler in summer than in winter. On Suderoe, near the village Famoien is a lake pretty high on the mountain, the water of which, though fresh, ebbs and flows with the sea. In summer the air is temperately warm, but seldom excessive hot. Winter is not extremely extremely cold, and though the land be under the 62d deg. N. lat. it seldom freezes a month together, nor produces it ice in the open inlets of the sea, so that horses and sheep are kept in open fields all the winter. It is thought, this is occasioned by the saltness and constant motion of the neighbouring sea, which produces warm vapours that temper the air, and make it moist; so that melted snow and melting rains fall in the vallies while it freezes on the mountains. Their moist air and watery clouds produce such stormy winds as sometimes tear up stones from the ground, and roll up the earth on the rock like sheets of lead.

These storms are variable, according to the gaps between the tops of the high mountains, where the winds gather, and press themselves through with wonderful force, when in the vallies underneath they have so calm an air, that they can carry candles from house to house. Sometimes the blasts are so violent as if they would tear the rocks, and contrary winds meet betwixt them, being rebounded by the rocks that jut out in the passes, and occasion terrible whirlwinds. These wheeling about among the hills, come down over the inlets, and whirling round, run through them again a great way into the sea, and endanger mariners, who must presently furl or be overturned.

These hurricanes frequently beat down man and horse in the vallies. But the inhabitants being forewarned by a terrible noise between the rocks, alight, lie down flat, and catch hold of grass or stones, till the blast be over. But these things happen seldom. Here is talc, and two sorts of salt-petre stones, but scanty. On the shore are found transparent stones, so hard that one may write upon glass with them. They are white, or white mixed with blue, and some are yellow, so well polished that they serve to put in rings. They grow in clefts, and are washed by the waves, but are not esteemed by jewellers. They are thought a sort of jasper, and they lose their colour when transported. Pearl-muscles are also found here, as well as some crystal, but so brittle that it cannot be wrought.

They have no trees, but some low juniper shrubs and willows. Their firing is turf, some of which is so good as to serve smiths instead of coal. No corn but barley comes to maturity; but this yields 20 or 30 fold, so that they need none from abroad. One of their smallest oxen yields 100lb. of tallow. Their horses are little, but strong, swift, and sure footed, though without shoes; so that people think themselves more secure on horseback than on foot upon the rocks and hills. They breed them to hunt wild sheep, keeping their tame sheep in separate inclosures. But they lose many in hard winters.

Sometimes, in a great snow, the sheep gather themselves close in the open fields, where they are covered quite over, and if not found out by a damp which rises from the snow above them, they are lost sometimes for a month together, and eat the earth about them, and the wool off one another. But this seldom happens, for the danger of it makes the people look carefully after them; and when they find them under the snow, they open a passage for them, or have weathers with every flock, which being stronger than the rest, break a passage for them. But they have no hay or any thing to relieve them but the grass and roots they dig from under the snow.

They have great numbers both of land and sea fowls, some of which all the year. The fishery was formerly so good that they maintained themselves by it alone, but it is now so much altered, that they have scarce sufficient to serve their necessities. Yet sometimes they have abundance of fish, which are seals, whales, cod, whittings, large flounders, plaice, trouts, sand-flounders, and a small fish called murt, resembling our pilchards, which sometimes in autumn fill their creeks, where the poor children take as many as may serve themselves and parents from meal to meal. Their seals haunt the inlets, and are of different sizes, some as big as cows, others no bigger than calves. They sleep on out-rocks, under promontories, where boats cannot reach them; and in September, when they bring forth their young, retire into caves under rocks.

The natives sometimes shoot them, at other times catch them with nets and dogs, which being trained to it, swim to them against the wind that the seals may not smell them, and catching them by the throat, hold them till their masters come up and kill them. The other way of taking them is by going in with boats to the mouth of the caves where they bring forth their young ones, and rowing as fast as they can, they leap out, some with candles to see where they lie, and others with clubs kill hundreds of old and young, yet not without danger from the old males, and likewise from the waves. When hauled out, &c. they eat of their flesh, melt part of the fat into train-oil, salt up part for food, with a black salt made of the ashes of a burnt sea-weed, and make shoes and other apparel of their skins.

The whales here are of several sorts, one called the grind-whale, because they have marks upon them resembling grates. The biggest are not above five-ells long, and the young an ell and a half. They come in great numbers under the land when the weather is dark or foggy. When the fishermen see them, they make signs to all the other other boats, who come presently together, and drive them in towards the land, by shouting and throwing of stones. They send men ashore at the same time, who by making a fire give notice to the inhabitants. These come with their boats from all the islands to the place where they see the fire or smoke; and, bringing their whale-spears with them, drive the whales into an inlet or creek, where are good whale-banks, or flat sands, and there kill them. The boats divide themselves into two companies, one of which attacks the whales, and the other draws up in the form of a half-moon, to prevent their escape to sea; and other people on the shore, with whale-spears, wade in as far as they can, and help to kill them. Sometimes the whales break or overturn boats with their tails; by which means men are now and then lost, and many of the whales escape. They melt part of the fat into train-oil, and salt up the rest for bacon with their black salt, which preserves it very well, so that it is scarce to be distinguished from true bacon. Other parts of the fat they use as butter. The flesh, when dry and fresh, resembles beef. Part of it they cut into long pieces, which they dry in the wind. Foreigners pickle part of the tail, which tastes like neats-feet, and therefore the inhabitants call these whales sea-kine.

Jacobson mentions a creature called a sea-dog, which sometimes drives those whales ashore. His upper parts above water, resemble those of a large rough spaniel. There is another sort of whales called doglins, above seven or eight ells long, and two broad where thickest. A small number of them come every year into a haven, in Suderoe, where the fishermen drive them into an inlet, if the weather be boisterous; but if it be calm, they are so tame that they suffer the fishermen to come up to them, and fasten a rope through the fat of one of their eye-lids, by which they haul them ashore, and kill them with whale-spears. They are not so good meat as the other; and if a person eats of their fat, it not only pierces the pores of his body, but also his cloaths, and makes him look yellow and smell strong. They have another kind called the roar and witch-whale, which being large and dangerous, the inhabitants dare not meddle with them, for they play about the boats, and sometimes rise under and overset them. It is said these islands were first inhabited in 868 by people from Norway, and that they were first discovered by a pirate of Norway. But there is no certain account of these things, their public papers having been carried away by pirates, as they say, above 160 years since. Authors differ too as to the etymology of their name. The inhabitants lived independent till about 1100, in the time of Sigurd, king of Norway, when they had governors placed among them.

When Norway came under the crown of Denmark, these islands met with the same fate. They were frequently invaded by pirates, but Christian IV. built a fort at Thorshaven, on Stromoe, for its defence, which is their chief town. Christianity was planted here about 1000; but they had no bishops till about 1100; and since the Reformation they have only had a provost. There are in all, 39 parishes. The churches are small, built with firs, and covered with stone on the outside. That at Thorshaven is built of whole beams, and has a steeple. Their best benefice, with all its perquisites, is not above 100 gilders, (i. e. 10l.) a year. But the ministers make it up with glebe and cattle, and by knitting of hose, in which they assist their wives and servants, and sometimes they have presents.

In stormy weather, &c. when they cannot attend their parishes, they appoint the people to read homilies, and sing psalms, on holy-days; and one that can read best to do it in the church on Sundays. By their diligence in reading the scriptures and good practical books, they understand religion better than the common people of Denmark, and have many of the psalms, and Luther's catechism, with a short explanation of it by rote. They have but one school, viz. at Thorshaven, where they learn to read and write, and those designed for the holy ministry are taught Latin. The inhabitants have the character of being humble, civil, courteous to strangers, whom they entertain gratis, and allow them carriages from place to place. They generally make little more provision but for present necessities, thinking every year will bring provisions for itself. They are temperate in diet, and keep beer but to treat friends; but at Christmas they are pretty jovial. None but the poorer sort are given to excess in brandy. Their diet is without bread, beer, or salt, for most part, but according to the seasons, flesh, milk, fish, gruel. They portion out meat to servants, twice as much to men as to maids; but they prescribe them their work accordingly. Every morning they weigh out two pounds of wool for them to spin, and knit it too that same day into a pair of coarse stockings, and weigh their work at night. This is part of the goods they export.

Their cloaths are always of coarse flannel, and of one fashion, but they have a finer sort for church and market. Their coats are short and wide, and they seldom wear linen. The womens cloaths are also of one fashion for rich and poor, being bodice and petticoats sewed together without skirts, but their petticoats are plaited. They have cloth for holidays, and chiefly affect a dark blue colour, and some red. Their bedding is hay, with a little flannel spread over it. They all make their own clothes, are fit enough for such handicrafts as they need, and make boats much better than those of Norway. The women, besides coarse flannels, weave much fine bed-clothes, of several colours, fine stockings, and woollen waistcoats, and dye all themselves. They have a sort of red, which they call a cork-colour, that none else can imitate. They are naturally inclined to observe the stars, especially Bootes, by which they know the hours in winter mornings, to direct them in their work.

FERRARA, (duchy of) or the FERRARESE, now a part of the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy, near the mouth of the Po. It is bounded on the N. by the Polesino di Rovigo, formerly a part of Ferrara; on the W. by the duchy of Mantua, on the S. by the Bolognese and Romandiola Proper, and on the E. by the gulph of Venice. The middle of it is in lat. 45, N. and 12 E. It is divided into the following parts, Il Polesino di Ariona, Il Polesino de Ferrara, Il Polesino de S. Georgio, La Valle de Commaçrio, La Valle de Marrare, and Valle de Maremorto.

FERRARA, the capital of the last-mentioned territory of the same name, in a fertile plain, watered by a branch of the Po, called Il Po Morto, from which is a canal to Francolino about six miles long, and another to Ceuto thrice that length, for the conveniency of commerce. This city, with the whole duchy, fell into the hands of pope Clement VIII. upon the demise of Alphonso II. of Esté, without male issue in 1597; but is now ill-peopled, and in many parts quite desolate. The city is defended by a citadel of five whole, and as many half bastions. It is a metropolitan see, and has an university.

This place having been almost reduced to a heap of rubbish by a dreadful earthquake 27 years before it came into that pontiff's possession, he rebuilt the streets and houses, and fortified it, erecting also a noble palace and other public structures, with his own statue in the piazza. The citadel is said to have cost him 200,000 pounds sterling.

Among other handsome buildings here is a fine cathedral, a beautiful benedictine monastery and church; in the latter of which is the monument of the famous Ariosto, author of Orlando Furioso, who, notwithstanding his rich vein of poetry, and being laureat to the emperor Charles V. was so poor as to have hardly clothes to his back.

In 1708 the place was blocked up by the Imperialists, and severely menaced, but it held out.

It lies 30 miles N. E. of Bologna. Lat. 44, 36, N. Long. 12, 14, E.

FERRO, by the Spaniards called Hierro, and by the French L'Isle de Fer, the most westerly island of the Canaries, in the Atlantic ocean, and near the coast of Africa: it belongs to Spain. In some parts the soil is dry and barren. Here the French navigators formerly placed the first meridian for reckoning the longitude, as the Dutch did theirs through the peak of Teneriff. But most geographers at present reckon the first meridian from the capital of their own country, as the English from London, the French from Paris, &c. See FERRO. Lat. 27, 48, N. Long. 17, 26, W.

FERROL, a town of Galicia, in Spain, upon a bay of the Atlantic ocean, with an excellent harbour. This is a station for the royal navy of Spain, where they frequently secured themselves in the late wars with England, and into which port their privateers carried several British prizes. It lies about two leagues from Corunna, and 24 miles N. E. of the Groyne. Lat. 43, 26, N. Long. 8, 46, W.

FERTE SUR L'AUBE, a town of Champagne, in France, on the river Aube, as its additional epithet shews. It lies 36 miles S. E. of Troyes. Lat. 48, 12, N. Long. 4, 48, E.

FERTE St. NECTAIRE, (La) or LA FERTE SENNETERRE, in Latin Firmitas S. Nectarii, a large town of Lower Orleanois, in France. It gave title of duke and peer to Henry Senterre: both it and the family are now extinct.

FERTE IMBANT, a small town of Sologne, in France, but has a noble castle on the little river Sendre. It lies five leagues E. from Remorantin.

FERTE ALAIS, or ALEPS, (La) a town of Hurepoix, in France, on the little river Seine, seven leagues S. of Paris, and on the road to Melun.

FESCAN, or FESCAMP, a considerable town and castle of Normandy, in France, with a harbour on the English channel, which has above 16 feet water at spring tides, defended by a tower and terrace-battery. The port and town are separated by a large marsh. Here is a governor, king's lieutenant, &c. and a famous abbey. They trade in woollen cloths, serges, linens, laces, hats, and tanned leather. They send also some ships to the Newfoundland cod-fishery; and a few barks are employed in that of the herrings. It lies 28 miles N. W. of Rouen. Lat. 49, 41, N. Long. 0, 26, E.

FETIPOUR, or FATAPOUR, a walled city of Agra and Hither India, in Asia. It lies 28 miles W. of Agra, and subject to the great Mogul. It was founded by Eckbar, who built here a stately palace and a noble bazar, with other pompous structures, intending it should surpass all other cities in his dominions; but the unwholesomeness of the water forced him to leave it, after he had laid out 4,000,000 l. sterling in adorning it. However here is a great reservoir, which supplies the town with rain water. It has a large square and many fine buildings, particularly a stately mosque. The town is walled, having a lake on the N. W. side five miles broad. The bazar, whose top is full of little pyramids, is 500 paces long, well built, and neatly paved; the court within being six times larger than the London royal exchange, and the whole supported with beautiful columns, each of one stone. The entrance of the palace is entire. Here is a great manufacture of fine taffetas. Lat. 27, 12, N. Long. 78, 46, E.

FETU, or AUFETU, a kingdom in South Guinea, borders W. on the river Benja and the country of Commendo, N. on Atti, E. on Saboo, S. on the ocean; the principal town Fetu. This country is very populous, and strikes terror into the neighbourhood. It has many well-built towns, full of inhabitants, abounds in corn and cattle, palm-wine, and oil, and is adorned with smooth straight roads set with trees on both sides. They apply themselves some to tillage, to fishing, to boiling of salt, to pressing oil, to drawing wine from the palm-trees, and others to trade. It has several villages on the sea coast.

FEVERSHAM, in Kent, 9 miles from Canterbury, 48 miles from London, a member of the Cinque port of Dover, was a royal demesne A. D. 802, and called in Kenulf's charter the king's little town, though it is now a large one. In 903, king Athelstan held a great council here. King Stephen erected a stately abbey, whose abbots sat in parliament, and that monarch was buried in it, together with Maud his queen, and Eustace his son; but two mean gate-houses are all that now remain of it. The town was first incorporated by the name of the barons of Feversham, afterwards by the title of the mayor and commonalty, and lastly by that of the mayor, and jurats, and commonalty. It is a populous, flourishing place, situated, as it were, in the very garden of Kent, with the convenience of a creek from the Thames, or that branch of it called the Swale, which is navigable by hoys, that bring corn and fruit to London. It consists chiefly of one long broad street, with a market-house and a charity school. The markets are on Wednesday and Saturday; fairs, February 25, and August 12. The London markets are supplied from hence with abundance of apples and cherries, and the best oysters for stewing, which are also fetched away in such quantities by the Dutch, that a prodigious number of men and boats are employed here in the winter, to work for them; and it is said also they carry home as many as amount to 2000 or 2500 l. a year. The fishermen will admit none to take up their freedom but married men. The ancient church was rebuilt in 1754, at 2300 l. expence. King James II. was stopped here, on board a smack, as he was escaping for France, and detained till the prince of Orange sent coaches and a guard to attend him to London. Near this place, as well as in other parts of the country, there are four pits, narrow at top, but wide at bottom, which, whether dug by the ancient Britons, for extracting chalk to manure their grounds, as Camden thinks, or whether dug by the Saxons, after the manner of the ancient Germans, to lay up their corn in, to preserve it from the extreme cold weather, or from any surprise of their enemies, has not yet been clearly determined.

FEUILLETIN, a town of France, in La Marche, on the confines of Bourbonnois, and in the election of Guéret.

FEURS, or FORS, though a small town of Lioinois, in France, it is the capital of Upper Fores. It lies on the river Loire, 20 miles W. of Lyons. Lat. 45, 52, N. Long. 4, 28, E.

FEXEM, a village in the bishopric of Liege, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany, where a battle was fought in October 1746, between the Allies, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine, and the French, under count Saxe. It lies four miles W. of Vifet, and 7 N. of the city of Liege. Lat. 50, 56, N. Long. 5, 46, E.

FEZ, (kingdom of) in Africa. It has the Mediterranean sea on the N. the Atlantic ocean on the W. the river Marbea or Umarabea on the S. where it divides Fez from Morocco, and is bounded on the E. by an imaginary line drawn from the mouth of the river Meluya or Melvia, to mount Atlas, dividing it from the kingdom of Algiers. It was formerly part of Mauritania Tingitana, is somewhat larger than Morocco, and divided like it into seven provinces. Its extent from E. to W. is about 270 miles, that is, from long. 1, 20, to 7, 0, W. where broadest; and nearly of the same breadth from N. to S. i. e. from lat. 31 to 36. This kingdom is fertile in grain, fruit, cattle, wax, and honey; but would be much more so, did the inhabitants cultivate it duly, the Fezians being contented with a bare sufficiency, and scrupulous of sending grain out of the kingdom. Here are good iron-mines; but they are so ignorant of manufacturing them, that they only make nails and some other coarse utensils. Their principal river is Sebu or Cebit, which is very rapid, rising in mount Celego, in the province of Cuz;

Cuz; and descending to the Atlantic ocean, is said to carry with its stream stones of an hundred weight. It runs within two short miles of Fez city, through vast ridges, receiving several other rivers in its course; yet over it is a bridge said to be 150 fathoms long: none of these rivers are navigable. The only carriage is by land upon camels, horses, and dromedaries, for expedition.

Fez had its own kings, but for some time it has been subject to Morocco. The Spaniards and Portuguese have some places on the coast; the principal of those belonging to the former are, Mazalquivir, Penen, Melilla, and Ceuta; the siege, or rather blockade, of which by the natives may be said still to be carried on. Among the places belonging to the Portuguese is Arzillai, having ceded Tangier as a part of queen Catharine's dowry to the English, who long since demolished it. The seven provinces above mentioned are, Fez Proper, Temesna, Asgur, Habat, Errif, Guret, Alcaia, and Chuz or Chaouz. M. de Lisle joins Asgur and Habat in one, under the name of Al-garbe. This kingdom and Morocco are under one emperor. See MOROCCO.

FEZ PROPER, (province of) in the kingdom of its name last mentioned. It is separated on the W. from Temesna by the river Burreg-reg or Sala; on the N. by that of Sebu, which divides it from Asgur; on the E. it extends to the river Gnavan; and on the S. to, Chaus, or according to some, quite to mount Atlas. Its soil is much the same with the kingdom of Fez already described; but being the province where the metropolis of its name stands, it is more populous and better cultivated. They have plenty of provisions, garden-vegetables, &c. and fish, particularly that called by the Spaniards sabalo, which is in great request, and caught from October to April. In this province is a territory 10 miles long, and five broad, which though fruitful, is very unhealthy, from the stagnated waters in it, occasioning pestilential fevers which carry off a great number of the inhabitants. The chief mountain here is Zalagh, about 15 miles from E to W. where the rich citizens of Fez have their gardens, orchards, and pleasure-houses; also mounts Zarhon, Taget, and Gueriguere. The first of these three is very well cultivated, and has about 40 towns and villages upon it.

FEZ, the capital of the last-mentioned province of the whole kingdom of its name, on the river Fez, is the largest city in all Africa; and is divided into the new and old city, or rather it consists of three different cities built at different times, under one and the same name, with magnificent palaces, seraglios, schools for propagating the Mahometan faith, &c.

The most ancient of all is that called Beleyd, on the eastern bank of the river, where lie the fine gardens and fountains of Zingifor, besides about 4000 houses. The other old city, called Ain Alu, stands on the W. side of the Fez, and is computed to contain 40,000 inhabitants. The walls of these two cities, said to have belonged to two different princes, who were continually at war, were at length demolished, and made into one, by building a bridge to join them. The third city, now called New Fez, stands above the other two, and about a mile from the Old, containing between 18 and 20,000 inhabitants, divided into 15 wards. Here is the emperor's palace, a large and noble structure, and has as many fine mosques and other public buildings as Old Fez. These three may be considered as one city, only as divided into old and new. The former and the most famed of the two, stands on the declivity of two mountains and the intermediate valley; it is walled and flanked with towers, being about eight miles in circuit. It hath no suburbs without, but several gardens within; and hath seven gates: the streets are narrow, and shut up also with gates. It is defended by two castles, the old and new, garrisoned by blacks, but without any cannon in either. On the two longest sides of the city are two sharp bastions on a rising ground, with only two iron cannon on each. The houses are mostly of stone or brick, three stories high, flat at top, and neatly furnished. The greatest part have high turrets, where the women have genteel apartments, but are not permitted to stir abroad. The river Fez dividing itself into six branches or canals, runs through most parts of the city. On these are 370 mills, mostly for corn, and about 250 stone bridges. Of about 500 mosques computed here, about 50 of them are well built and endowed; one of which is said to be half a league in compass. Within the cincture of this mosque is a stately college, in which divinity, and some other sciences, are taught: the other public buildings, as baths, hospitals, &c. are very noble. Here are above 200 inns, very large and convenient, which pay an annual tax to the governor; but excepting those resorted to by Christians, are receptacles of all sorts of debauchery, the most infamous and unnatural crimes being committed barefaced, and with impunity. Fez is computed to have about 300,000 inhabitants. It swarms with men of all trades and professions, also with merchants; this being the general magazine of Barbary, where all sorts of European goods are brought and exchanged, and sent to the other provinces of the kingdom, in barter for leather of several sorts, particularly the fine marroquin, &c. and their other native productions. The Jews, which which are above 5000, are the principal brokers, especially between the Christians and Mahometans. Most part of the inhabitants are negroes from Negroland, or the descendants of such; the rest are of an olive colour. Fez lies 28 leagues S. from the Mediterranean, 33 E. from the Atlantic ocean, and about 260 N. E. of Morrocco. Lat. 33, 58, N. Long. 4, 25, W.

FIANO, a small city of St. Peter's Patrimony, in the Ecclesiastical State, and middle division of Italy; it lies on the Tiber. A wood in its neighbourhood was formerly dedicated to the goddess Feronia, hence called Lucus Feroniae. It lies 15 miles N. of Rome.

FIANANO, a town belonging to the republic of Venice, in the peninsula of Istria, 17 miles N. of Pola, seated on the gulph of Carnero, at the mouth of the river Arsa.

FIASCONI, or MONTE FIASCONI, a small episcopal city of Orvieto, one of the Ecclesiastical states in the middle division of Italy, near the lake Bassena. Its see is united to that of Corneto, and is famous for its white wine. It lies 14 miles S. of Orvieto city. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 13, 12, E.

FICARI, a town of Corsica, in the Mediterranean sea, seated on the S. coast of the island, 22 miles W. of Bonifacio, and at the mouth of a small river of the same name.

FICHERULOLA, a fortified town of Italy, in the Ferrarese, seated on the river Po, on the frontiers of Mantua, 12 miles above Ferrara. There is a canal from the above river to Tartaro. Long. 11, 37, E. Lat. 44, 58, N.

FIDA. See WHIDA.

FIDAN, a river in Monmouthshire, which runs into the Usk against Penavawell hill.

FIDELA, a small island on the coast of, and belonging to Fez, lies in the Atlantic ocean over-against Rabat, and near the mouth of a river, in lat. 33, 34, and about 10 leagues S. W. of Sala.

FIDENÆ, or FIDENA, a city in ancient Latium, near the Tyber, about five miles from Rome towards Eretum. It is now called Castel Giubileo or Jubileo. It only merits a place here on account of the following accident. In the reign of Tiberius, one Attilius, having built here an amphitheatre, to exhibit therein a shew of gladiators, vast crowds flocked thither from Rome, eager for such shews, as during that emperor's reign, they had been debarred from diversions at home. But as the spectators were intent upon the gladiators, the amphitheatre, which was but slightly built, and overcharged with the multitude, fell down, and with its fall, Tacitus tells us, destroyed or maimed 50,000 persons; of whom, Suetonius says, perished 20,000 souls. Attilius, who had built the amphitheatre only for gain, and therefore employed bad materials and unskilful workmen, was banished; and it was provided for the future, by a decree of the Senate, that no man who was not worth 400,000 sesterces should exhibit the shew of gladiators. The said accident happened in the year of the world 4333, of the flood 3026, of Christ 27.

FIERENZUOLO, a small town of Parma, in the Upper Division of Italy, on the river Larda. It lies 12 miles S. E. of Placentia, where is a famous Bernardine abbey. Lat. 44, 56, N. Long. 10, 46, E.

FIESOLI, anciently Fæsulæ, a town of Tuscany, in the Upper Division of Italy, between Pratolino and the city of Florence, only two miles N. E. of the latter. It was one of the 12 ancient Hetruscan cities. Lat. 43, 36, N. Long. 12, 20, E.

FIFE, (shire of,) in the S. part of Scotland. It was anciently called the Shire of Rofs, which name is still preserved in Kinross, i. e. the head of Rofs, and also in Culross, i. e. the back part of Rofs, as the Highland words Kaan and Cuul import. The name of Fife it had, they say, from one Fifus, a nobleman; to whom Kenneth II. gave it for his great services against the Picts in 840. His posterity were first called thanes of Fife, which seems to have been the first title of nobility in that kingdom, and afterwards created earls by Malcolm II. about the year 1057, and endowed them with greater privileges than any other earls in the country. Of these, the Great Macduff, who subdued the tyrant Macbeth, was the first, whose posterity had the privileges of placing the king at his coronation in the chair, heading the vanguard of the king's army, and of compounding for murder with cattle or money; of which Macduff's cross in Abernethy, in Perthshire, is a monument.

Fifeshire is a fine fruitful peninsula, situated between the frith of Forth and that of Tay; the former dividing it from the Lothians on the S. and the latter from Strathern, the Carse of Gowry, and the shire of Angus, on the N. and also from Part of Perthshire and Clackmannanshire on the N. W. It is bounded on the W. by the Ochil-hills, Kinross-shire, and part of Perthshire; and has the German ocean on the E. It is commonly reckoned 32 miles long, and about 17 broad. The E. part is level, and the W. more mountainous. The N. and S. parts are very fruitful in corn, and full of small towns, but none of them so flourishing as their situation would promise, with good bays and harbours; but the middle is more proper for pasture, there being abundance of cattle, especially sheep, the wool of which which is much valued; as are also the hides of their black cattle, deer, and goats, which turn to a good account. On the S. side, towards the coast of the Forth, they have many coal-pits, that produce the Scotch coal; also several salt-pans, where they make very good white salt. The Ochil-hills on the W. afford good pasture, intermixed with corn-fields; and between them are pleasant fruitful valleys. At Dalgate is a quarry of excellent free-stone, and near the water of Ore they find lead; as also numbers of fine crystals, of various colours, at the Bin (Byne) a peak of the Ochil-mountains, and at Orrock, a crag on the water of Ore. Here also are mineral springs, as the Spaw at Kinghorn and Balgriggy. Its principal rivers are the Leven, issuing from a lough of its name, and the Eden, both abounding with salmon, &c.

The little towns, mostly royal burghs, on this coast of the Forth, are at least a nursery for seamen; and the sea, besides variety of white fish, herrings being caught in great quantities in August and September, yields plenty of oysters, and other shell-fish. No shire in Scotland sends so many members to the British parliament: and in it are four presbyteries, namely, Cowpar, St. Andrew's, Kirkaldy, and Dumfermling. This shire has also more nobility inhabiting it, than any other part of Scotland.

FIFENESS, the most northern point of land on the frith of Forth, or Edinburgh frith.

FIGALO, (Cape,) a promontory of Epirus, in European Turkey, opposite to Préveza, at the mouth of L'Arta. This headland was anciently called Actium, and famous for the naval battle between Marc Anthony and Augustus, in which the former was defeated, and sailed away after Cleopatra. Here was formerly a considerable city, in which was a temple of Apollo, now an ordinary sea-port town and cape.

FIGEAC, in Latin, Fiacum or Figeacum, a town of Upper Quercy and Guyenne, in France, near the confines of Upper Auvergne, on the river Selæ. In 1568, about 30,000 Protestant besieged it, but after three months, they were obliged to quit it; yet in 1576 it fell into their hands, and they kept it till 1622, when the duke of Sully took it from them. The citadel has been demolished, and the place dismantled. It lies 29 miles N. E. of Cahors. Lat. 44, 49, N. Long. 1, 42, E.

FIGUERA, a small town of Catalonia, in Spain, 16 miles W. of Roses. Lat. 42, 26, N. Long. 2, 51, E.

Of the same name is a port of Beira in Portugal, on the mouth of the river Mondego.

FIGUIERO-DOS-VINHOS, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, seated among the mountains near the river Zizere, and remarkable for its excellent vineyards, which produce curious wine. It is 18 miles N. of Tomar, and 25 S. S. E. of Coimbra. Long. 7, 25, W. Lat. 39, 48, N.

FILLEK, a dismantled town of Upper Hungary, on the river Ibol. It had once a strong wall and castle on the top of a craggy hill, accessible only by one passage, and that by one man in front. It has been often taken.

FILLENGHAM, a village in Lincolnshire, seven miles N. of Lincoln, with one fair on November 22.

FIMES, or FISMES, Antoninus's Ad-Fines or In-Finibus, a town of Champagne in France, on the river Vesle, between Rheims and Soissons, upon the confines of the isle of France. Two councils were holden in the church of St. Maria the Martyr here in 881 and 935. In the former presided Hincmar archbishop of Rheims.

FINAL, a strong fortress on the Genoese coast, in the territory of its name and Upper Division of Italy. Its castle on a rock is very well fortified, and flanked with four towers. The town is walled, and covered by two forts, guarding the avenues of the mountains to the castle; and here is a commodious harbour.

In 1745 the English fleet threw several bombs into the town, but with very little effect, though next year the king of Sardinia invested it by land, and took it, but by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748 it was restored.

This territory along the coast is not six miles inland, but it reaches quite to the Appennine mountains. The emperor Charles VI. sold this marquisate to the republic of Genoa, in 1713, in whose possession it still continues, and is very convenient for them, as it divides their other dominions in the middle. It lies between Savona and Albenga, 36 miles N. E. of Oneglia. Lat. 44, 30, N. Long. 9, 12, E.

FINAL, to distinguish it from the former, is called Modenese, as lying in this duchy and Upper Italy, upon an island formed by the Panaro, N. E. of Modena, and on the confines of Mantua.

FINCHAM, a village in Norfolk, with one fair on March 3.

FINCHAMSTEAD, a village in Berkshire, with one fair on April 23.

FINDEN, a village in Suffex, with one fair on Holy-Thursday.

FINDORN, a river in the N. of Scotland, which rising in the mountains near Badenoch, and not far from its source, taking the name of Ern, runs a pretty way under that denomination through a valley, hence called Strathern, or Strader, a district of the laird of Macintosh's estate, and inhabited by the Clanchattan; after this it takes the name of Findorn, and passing by the castle of Tarnaway, and not far from Brody-castle, empties itself about two miles below Forreys, at the village or port for small vessels, of its own name, into the Murray frith. This river is a considerable stream a pretty way above its mouth, even beyond Corrybrough Macqueen's, one of the stages from Inverness to Edinburgh, and abounds with excellent salmon all along its course.

FINGALL, a small territory in the county of Dublin, and province of Leinster, within shore, to the N. This is a well cultivated tract, and yields such plentiful crops every year, that Camden says it is, as it were, the granary of the kingdom.

FINISTERRE, (Cape,) the most westerly headland of Galicia in Spain, and of the whole continent of Europe. Lat. 43, 6, N. Long. 9, 58, W.

FINLAGGEN, (Loch,) a fresh-water lake three miles in circuit, in the middle of Ilay or Ilay, the most western island of Scotland. It abounds in salmon, trouts, and eels, emptying itself by a river called Laggan, into the sea. It is so called from its island, the royal seat of the great Macdonald, who was crowned and anointed king of the isles, by the bishop of Argyle and seven priests, in presence of all the heads of the tribes of the isles, and those of the neighbouring main land. The ruins of his palace are still to be seen, not to say any thing of the houses of his courtiers and guards, of all which pomp those early and warlike ages seem to have had very little, strength and security being all that they wanted.

FINLAND, in Latin, Finlandia, or Finnia, a large country in Sweden, which bounds the N. E. angle of the gulph of Bothnia and the gulph of Finland, between the 60th and the 65th degree of N. latitude. The country is rocky, and full of high mountains, covered with forests, and immense marshes, with a vast number of lakes, some of them distinct, others having a communication together. In many of these lakes are islands; and in their neighbourhood many tracts of land very fit for agriculture. The greatest part of Finland is subject to Sweden.

The Finns, that fertile stock, which has been the parent of almost all the northern nations of Europe, are themselves of Asiatic origin. In the most obscure periods of antiquity they abandoned their eastern seats, to settle in the western parts, which they occupy at present. It should seem that the Finns only separated from the Laplanders in the 30th century, on the introduction of Christianity among them, and on their having fixed habitations and other establishments. Many mountains, rivers, and lakes, bear Lapland names.

With regard to externals, the Finns differ nothing from the Laplanders; but that the former are more civilized and better informed. They are of the common proportion, and live in towns and villages. They have schools and academies among them; and make considerable progress in the arts and sciences. They profess the Lutheran faith, and use the Christian æra in their chronology. The Russian government has continued to them the enjoyment of their Swedish privileges, by which they are free. They form but one state, and have no nobility; but the boor yields precedence to the citizen, to the merchant, and to all persons in the service of the crown, whom they call 'People of Quality.'

Their towns are built after the Swedish manner. They carry on commerce, and the other business and trades which are common in towns. The boors are employed in agriculture, hunting, fishing, or the work in the forests, preparing pitch and tar, building vessels, &c. Not only the villages, but likewise the little farms that compose them, are often at a distance from one another, so that a Finn's estate is generally of a great extent.

The house comprehends a room for summer, another for winter, and a third for a kitchen. The yard contains barns for corn and hay, stables, and upright frames to dry the corn upon. Besides these, they have magazines for different purposes, and a bath all built of firs, laid on one another without regularity, after the manner of building in Sweden and Russia. The furniture and household implements are the same as in Sweden.

All kinds of corn succeed very well, especially in Carelia; but in many provinces it is subject to frequent accidents from the nature of the soil, which is a cold clay. The ground in many places abounds with springs. Their nights are cold, and the hoar frost comes very early. The most certain crops are those of rye and barley. As even in the years of greatest fertility the country consumes the crop, a severe dearth must naturally be the consequence of a short harvest; and then the people are obliged to eke out their meal by the mixture of fir-bark, and other vegetable substances.

The Northern Finns still make use of rein-deer; the rest employ the usual beasts for draught, as horses and oxen. All their cattle are hardened to the climate, but small. The chase and fishing supply supply the generality of the inhabitants with the most certain food. The female boors are industrious and good housewives; they make linen, and a coarse cloth called Volmar, and understand the art of dyeing. Their frames for weaving are of the simplest construction, without being deficient in any thing essential. They may be taken to pieces, rolled up with the woof and all the work upon them, and set up again in an instant. The Tartars for the most part make use of frames of the same kind.

The Finns do not make butter after the Russian manner, causing it to curdle by heat; but by beating the cream till it thickens. The lower people are great eaters, making five meals a day, and are immoderately fond of brandy.

The dress of the inhabitants of towns, as well as that of persons of distinction, differs in nothing from what is worn in the Swedish towns; and that of the boors is not much unlike that of Sweden. They generally wear their beards, though many are content with whiskers. They wear breeches, and many of them twist rags round their legs instead of stockings. Some of them wear leathern shoes; others a sort of sandals; but the greatest part of them made of matting. They wear a waistcoat, with a small coat cut exactly to their shape, which they button, buckling over that a leathern girdle. Their hair is never tied up, and they wear on their heads a hat somewhat in the Dutch fashion, or caps of different shapes. A large knife, keys, and instruments for striking fire, are tied to their girdle. Their cloaths are made of the coarse cloth called Volmar, which their wives and daughters make; sometimes they are made of finer cloth, which they buy; of skins and linen, and in hot weather, of white linen. In winter, their outward garment is a sheep-skin, with the wool worn inwards, and other skins.

The women wear shifts and drawers, stockings, and slippers, or a kind of shoes which cover no more than the under part of the feet, and come over the toes like a sock; a gown like a short, wide, loose shift, without sleeves. Their apron is small, but their waistcoat or boddice is made like a common shift, with wide sleeves. They cover their head with a linen mantle, which falls over their shoulders and half their back. Their neck and breast are adorned with a number of strings of glass-beads; and they always wear large ear-rings. In summer, their petticoats and boddice are made of linen, dyed after their own fancy by themselves. Sometimes they are decked with a kind of embroidery of various colours, and with little white shells. Their winter-clothes are made of coarse cloth, or sheep skins. Their aprons are not gathered, but whimsically set off with work, glass-beads, fringes, &c. The girdle passes twice round the waist, and is tied in a large knot at the side, and is either leather or linen, about three fingers broad, fringed at the two extremities.

In winter, the country-women that are in easy circumstances, wear costly furs on holidays, when they appear in gala. In summer their dress differs but little from that of the meaner sort above described, but is rather more elegant, and more highly finished, and of course made with more trouble. Their little gown is of silk, longer than common, with ornaments of a different colour, resembling furbeloes. It is adorned before, from the knees down to the furbeloe, with taudry embroidery, and glass-beads, &c. The small apron which they wear is striped with several colours, wrought and adorned with medals and glass-beads. Their girdle is studded with tin and brass in the form of buttons, and is tied before with a number of ribbands. The gown is hemmed at the bosom with great nicety, and likewise embellished with glass-beads and shells.

These people likewise hang several strings of false pearls round their neck. A great number of ribbands, of about six inches in length, pass through their great ear-rings, and float upon their shoulders and shift sleeves, which are very full, open, short, and prettily wrought with different coloured worsted. Their head is covered with a handkerchief folded in a fanciful manner, passing under the girdle, and falling down the back to the heels. Under this head-dress is a circlet of leather, about as broad as one's hand, to cover the hair; at the forehead it is covered with gold-lace, or shells and beads, and a white fringe, finishes it at the eyebrows.

The Finns have professed Christianity for several centuries, and follow the ecclesiastical constitution of Sweden. Their ceremonies therefore at marriages and interments, differ not more from those in Sweden, than particular provinces in large states vary from one another. When a country girl is promised in marriage, she must make a present of four or five ells of linen, and a pair of stockings, to every person that is invited to the nuptials. The guests, in return, make her a present in money. But, as this does not compensate the expence of the linen and stockings, and as the money remains with the bride, the marriage of daughters becomes so burdensome to mothers, that it has occasioned the proverb; 'Marriageable girls ruin the farm.'

The Finns frequently live to a very advanced age, although the dropsy, the scurvy, the epilepsy, and especially the hypochondriac affection, which they call 'hioutanti,' are diseases very common among the country people.

The

The ancient Finns were such zealous idolaters, that it was found necessary to call in the secular arm to advance their conversion, which was effected about the middle of the 12th century, in the reign of Eric king of Sweden, during the papacy of Alexander III. and under Stephen and Henry, bishops of Upsal. In the middle of the 16th century they were compelled to embrace Lutheranism by the Swedes, who did not give themselves much concern about the reality of their convictions.

After so long a succession of ages, the particulars of their ancient idolatrous religion are become very obscure and imperfect; but the principles and foundation of it are yet to be met with among the Laplanders, and other descendants of these Finns, who have perpetuated their idolatry.

Bears are held in great estimation among all the Pagan nations of the north and north-east. These people believe that the souls of these animals continue to live after their death, as well as those of the human race; and this it is that has occasioned all that superstitious grimace observable in the hunting of this animal.

The Czar Peter of Russia, subdued the whole of Finland from the Swedes, but restored it at the peace of Nyslot, except a part of Carelia and Kexholm. However, by the late war which was concluded by the treaty of Abo, in 1743, Sweden agreed to yield for ever to Russia, part of Savolaxia, and all Kexholm, with the best part of Carelia; namely, all the branches of the river Kymen, except the country on the W. side of the last branch; as also the town and fortrefs of Nyslot, with a frontier on the N and W. sides. The inhabitants of Finland, which is stiled the Grand Duchy, were formerly a barbarous people, and had kings of their own, till about the middle of the 13th century, Erick IX. king of Sweden, conquered them. It has sometimes been an appendage to the brothers of the king of Sweden, but is now annexed to the crown. It is divided into seven provinces; Finland Proper, Nyland, Carelia, Kexholm, Savolaxia, Tavastia or Tavastland and Cajania.

FINO, (Capo,) a large barren rock in the dominions of Genoa, on the main land and Upper Division of Italy, with a castle on its E. peak.

Near it is a small harbour of its own name, and anciently called Portus Delphini.

FINSTERBERG, or VENSTERBERG, in Latin Moies Venustus, a mountain of the Grisons, in Switzerland, of which the house of Austria still retains the sovereignty, and takes a considerable revenue from the toll of a bridge which they keep up here, on the river Inn.

FIOM, or FIUM, a province of Middle Egypt, in Africa. It runs along the western bank of the Nile, and bounded on the W. by the Lybian desert. It is a very fruitful province in corn, wine, a peculiar sort of which is made here, fruit, &c. with a great number of towns and villages.

FIOM, the capital of the last-mentioned province, a large and populous city. Though most of the houses be low and mean, here are some handsome streets and buildings, especially those of the Turkish officers. It has also some noble piers of antiquity, and supposed to be built out of the ruins of the ancient Arsina; so that hardly a house but has some fragment of a marble, granite, &c. column, cornice, or capital. Its principal commerce consists in linen, plain and striped, fine leather, carpets, fine mats, figs, &c. and other fruits, which it sends to Cairo. Here are numbers of Christian Copti, with a bishop, but no church, their divine service being performed at a neighbouring village. The territory round it is full of delightful gardens, orchards, &c. well-planted and watered, the city standing on a canal which runs from the Nile to lake Moeris. This canal is called Bahr Jouzef, or Joseph's River; over which is the greatest number of bridges in all Egypt. Here a cashif of several shieks resides, with other Turkish officers.

Besides the antiquities in and about Fium, are three, the grandest curiosities of art and antiquity in the world, to be met with in this province, and those are the Pyramids. See PYRAMIDS, the labyrinth and its temple, with the lake Moeris. The labyrinth is 12 palaces, said to contain 3000 rooms, one half under ground, and cut into the rock in so intricate a manner, that a stranger could not find his way out. The lake Moeris is chiefly famous for the island in it, where was a burying-ground, whither dead bodies were to be ferried over by one Charon, whence arose the heathenish fable of his waisting departed souls into the Elysian shades. Fium lies in lat. 29, 35, N. and long. 30, 30, E.

FIORENZO, (San,) a small but convenient sea-port of Corsica, in Lower Italy, with a good haven on the N. side of the island, and a bay of its name; it is the residence of the bishop of Nebio, which is four miles off. But its air being unhealthy, it is thinly inhabited. It lies seven miles W. of Bastia, and 18 S. of Capo Corso.

FIORENZOLO, or FLORENTIOLA, an ancient city of Gallia Cispadana, now a little town of Buffeto, in the duchy of Parma, and Upper Italy, on the road between the cities of Parma and Placentia, and about six miles from Burgo St. Domino.

Of the same name is a pleasant valley running through a barren tract, between Florence and Bologna.

FIORENZOLA,

F I

FIORENZOLA, formerly Florentinum, once an episcopal city of the Capitanate, in Naples, and Lower Italy; but its see having been annexed to that of Lucera, there is little else left of it but the ancient cathedral, and an old village. It lies 10 miles S. of St. Severino, and 20 W. of Maufredonia. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 15, 57, E.

FIRANDO, an island of Japan in Asia, near the western coasts of the isle of Ximo, from about lat. 33, 20, to 33, 53, N. and about long. 130, 40, E. Though small, it hath the title of kingdom, and a convenient harbour, the entrance into which is narrow and dangerous; but large enough within to contain a good number of vessels, and secure them from all winds. This was a place of little account before the Dutch made it their grand staple, when after building forts, magazines, and dwelling-houses, it became a place of great trade and resort, having from one street got to have 40, till the emperor, through jealousy at these improvements ordered them to quit the place and the island. In this island is besides a stately castle on a hill in a spacious plain, with a noble bridge leading to it, and a lofty tower several stories high in it. To the castle are eight gates, and at the foot of the hill are four pavilions answering to its four angles.

FIRMINGHAM, a village in Suffex, with one fair on September 4, for lean cattle and toys.

FISHERS-ISLAND. It is situated about five miles from the coast of Connecticut, near the mouth of the Thames river, it is E. and W. near five miles long, and about one and a half broad N. and S.

FISHGARD, or FISCARD, in Pembrokeshire, situated on a steep cliff, on the sea shore, 244 miles from London. Situated at the influx of the river Gwaïne, into the sea, which here forms a spacious bay. It is governed by a mayor, bailiff, and other officers, and here vessels may lie in safety in five or six fathoms water. The inhabitants, have a good trade in herrings, and annually cure between Fishgard and Newport, above 1000 barrels of them. The adjacent country abounds in corn, and several kinds of grain; and the town has a weekly market on Saturdays, but no fairs.

FISSIMA, a famous town of Japan; eight miles from Meaco, and 40 from Ofacca. Long. 134, 10, E. Lat. 33, 35, N.

FIVE-CHURCHES, so called from five magnificent churches it formerly contained, is an episcopal town of Lower Hungary, whose prelate is suffragan to Gran. It has been twice taken, once by the Turks, and the other time by prince Lewis of Baden, by surprise, and is subject to the house of Austria. It lies 81 miles S. of Buda. Lat. 46, 25, N. Long. 19, 15, E.

FIVELGO, a district of the Dutch Netherlands, in the province of Groningen, lying on both sides the river Fivel. An inundation that happened in 1686, destroyed above 400 people; and another, in December 1717, did vast damages.

FIUM, a large town of Africa, and capital of a province of the same name, in Egypt. It is very populous, and the Cophti have a bishop's see. Here are a great many ruins of magnificent ancient structures. They carry on a considerable trade in flax, linen-cloth, mats, raisins, and figs. This province contains a great number of canals and bridges built by the ancient Egyptians. It is seated on a canal which communicates with the Nile, 70 miles S. W. of Cairo. Long. 31, 29, E. Lat. 29, 0, N.

FIUME, or St. VEIT, a town of Istria, with a harbour on the Adriatic Sea. It is subject to the house of Austria, and lies 42 miles E. of Cabo di Istria. Lat. 45, 50, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

FIXTELA, an open town of Tedla in Africa, containing 700 families. On the S. side it is defended by a good old castle with a double wall, the outer flanked with towers and a deep quagmire; above it is a high tower on a mountain; and on the W. side is another tower, joined to the castle by a wall with a double parapet. The inhabitants are Barbers, who are stout, and carry on a traffic and manufacture of woollen garments from it called Fiftiles. Between this town and Tefza runs the Derna, which descends from Mount Atlas; here a battle was fought between the king of Fez and sherif of Morocco, in which the former was overthrown and taken prisoner, upon which the town and castle submitted, and have done so ever since. It lies about a mile from Tefza.

FLADDA, one of the Western Isles, about two leagues N. W. of Sky in Scotland, only two miles in circuit; but much noted for its fishery of all sorts, and for large whales that pursue the fish on the coast. The sea-fowl, called coulternebs, are very numerous here, and great flocks of plovers come hither from Sky in September, and return again in April. Among many rocks round this island is one particularly remarkable, called the Round-table, about half a mile in circuit, with a fresh-water spring upon it. This makes an impregnable natural fort, and can be climbed up only one way, and by one man at a time. Of the same name is a little island near that of Arran in the frith of Clyde. The former of these isles is marked in our maps, but the latter not.

FLAMBOROUGH-HEAD, a promontory and pretty high rocky land on the German ocean, in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, six miles to the N. E. of Burlington, forming one end of the bay of the latter name. Lat. 54, 8, N. Long. 0, 11, E.

FLANDERS,

FLANDERS, (Proper) a province of the Low Countries, and its first county or earldom, in Flemish called Vlanderen, and in Latin Flandria. It is bounded by Hainault, Artois, and part of Picardy on the S. the North sea on the W. the same sea on the N. with the Hond, a branch of the Scheld that parts it from Zealand, and by the marquisate of the Holy Empire, Brabant, and part of Hainault, on the E. It is 50 miles long, and about the same in breadth. It is now divided into three parts; namely, Austrian, French, and Dutch Flanders. The house of Austria have the greatest share, with Ghent its capital. The French possess the S. W. part, in which are Lille and Dunkirk; and the Dutch the N. E. part, in which are the strong fortresses of Sluys, Sas-van-Ghent and Hulst. The inhabitants are very laborious, both in cultivating their land, and in their manufactures and trade, which no nation understand better. The air near the sea is thick and raw; but the higher you remove inland, the clearer and finer the air. At a distance from the sea the country produces a great deal of wood, either for timber or fuel. Here they feed a vast number of horses, but mostly fitter for the plough than any other use.

This country abounds with excellent pastures for black cattle and sheep. The soil produces abundance of corn, greens, and fruit of all sorts. And they brew in this province a great deal of excellent beer. It is extremely populous, a perfect level, watered with innumerable rivers and canals, being conveniently situated for trade, with some of the finest cities in Europe, and above 1000 other towns and villages. It has for some ages past been the scene of bloody wars: and sometimes the whole ten provinces of the Netherlands are called Flanders. Its principal rivers are the Scheld, the Lys, the Dender, and the Scarp. See NETHERLANDS or LOW COUNTRIES.

FLANNAN-ISLANDS, six small islands, called by seamen the North-hunters, not far from Lewis, one of the Western Islands in Scotland, to the inhabitants of which they belong, who keep some sheep here, and come once every summer to fetch them; also fowl, eggs, down, feathers, and quills. One of the islands is called Pigmies Island, from the many small bones resembling those of the human species, which have been dug up there.

FLATBUSH, a small town on Long Island, where the king's troops passed, in pursuit of the Provincials.

FLATLAND, a village on Long Island, where the king's troops pursued the Provincials, Oct. 22, 1776, when they attacked New York.

FLECHE, (La) a town of Anjou, and con-finer of Maine, in France, on the river Loire. It is situated in a pleasant valley, with vineyards and groves all around. It has but one parish; but it being the property of K. Henry the Great, independently from the crown, he founded a noble college of Jesuits, which is a very magnificent building, and the church very large and beautiful. Among many learned men educated here was the famous Descartes. It lies 24 miles N. E. of Angers. Lat. 47, 34, N. Long. 0, 4, E.

FLEET, a river of Nottinghamshire, which runs into the Trent at Girtow.

FLENSBURG, a large and handsome town of Sleswick, on the bottom of the bay Flens, running up four miles inland, and formed by the Baltic. It is a fine haven, where ships of great burden may ride safe, and come up to the very warehouses. On the land-side it is encompassed with mountains, upon one of which, near the suburbs, is a castle commanding the gulph on that side. Here are four churches. It is the capital of a bailiwick called Angelen or Engeland, and the country of the English Saxons, or Angles, who came over into Britain, and gave it the name of England. It lies 18 miles N. of Sleswick, and belongs to Denmark. Lat. 55, 20, N. Long. 9, 45, E.

FLETCHING, a village in Suffex, between Lewes and East-Grinstead, with a fair on the Monday before Whitfunday.

FLEURUS, or FLEURS, a borough of Namur, one of the provinces of the Austrian Netherlands. Here in 1622 count Mansfeldt was defeated by Don Gonzales de Cordoua, with the loss of their cannon and all their baggage; yet he happily joined the prince of Orange with the remainder, and thereby raised the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom. Also another battle in 1690, between the Confederate army, commanded by Prince Waldec, and the French, under Marshal Luxemburg; when the former were routed, with the loss of 5000 killed and 4000 taken prisoners, besides 49 pieces of cannon. It lies eight miles N. E. of Charleroy. Lat. 50, 41, N. Long. 4, 26, E.

FLEURY, a town of Burgundy in France. It lies 27 miles N. of Chalons. Lat. 47, 21, N. Long. 4, 42, E.

FLIE, or VLIE, an island on the coast of Holland, at the entrance into the Zuyder-zee. It is also called Flieland or Vlieland, and lies N. E. of the isle of Texel, being about nine miles long, and but two broad. It has only two villages, and is principally remarkable for the great quantity of mussels found here.

It is bounded on the E. by Cheshire, on the S. E. by Shropshire, and on the S. and W. by Denbysire, which separates a small part of it from the rest on the S. E. side. This is the least of all the Welsh counties, being reckoned 33 miles from N. W. to S. E. but its breadth from N. to S. not above eight. It contains 28 parishes, including one city, one borough, three market towns, with 32,000 inhabitants. The greatest part of it lies in the diocese of St. Asaph, and the rest belongs to that of Chester. The air is healthful. Here are but moderate hills, interlaced with valleys, fruitful both in grain and pasture, feeding abundance of small cattle, from which they make great quantities of butter and cheese. They have also honey, of which they make metheglin, drank much in this country. Though here is plenty of pit-coal, there is very great scarcity of wood, and no great abundance of fruit. The sea and its rivers, particularly the Clwyd and Dee, supply it plentifully with most kinds of fish and fowl. Some of its hills have lead ore, and some mill-stones are dug here. Its peculiar rivers are the Wheeler, the Sevon, and Aled; the two first of which fall into the Clwyd, and the last into the Dee. This county sends a knight of the shire to parliament, and a burgess for the ancient borough of FLINT, the chief town of Flintshire, in North Wales. It has no market, but has four fairs, viz. on February 15, June 24, August 10, and November 30. It is commodiously seated on the river Dee, and is but a small place, though it sends one member to parliament. It was formerly noted for its castle, where Richard II. took shelter on his arrival from Ireland; but having quitted it, he was taken prisoner by the duke of Lancaster. The castle now is in a ruinous condition; the assizes are still held in the town. It is 12 miles S. W. of Chester, five N. E. of Holywell, and 105 N. W. of London.

FLIX, a small, but well-fortified, town of Catalonia, in Spain, upon a peninsula formed by the river Ebro, where is a famous water-fall. It lies 18 miles N. of Tortosa. Lat. 41, 21, N. Long. 0, 15, E.

FLODDEN, a village of Northumberland; on the river Till; near which was fought a memorable battle; when king James IV. was slain with the principal of his nobility.

FLORENCE, (territory of) or IL FIORENTINO, the most considerable part of the duchy of Tuscany, in the middle division of Italy. The river Arno runs through the middle of it. On the N. E. it is bounded by the Bolognese and Romagna, on the E. by the Ecclesiastical state, on the S. by the Sieneſe, and on the W. by the territories of Lucca and Pisa, which last is frequently included in it.

FLORENCE, the capital of the last-mentioned district, in Italian called Il Fiorenza, anciently Florentia: a celebrated city even in the time of the Romans. It stands on the river Arno, which parts it into two, and in a delightful plain; it is surrounded with fertile hillocks on all sides, but that towards Pistoja. In the neighbourhood are vast numbers of country-seats, gardens, villages, &c. Its circuit is computed between six and seven miles, is walled, has good fortifications, a broad ditch, and other works. Here are three stout citadels, one of which is a regular pentagon. Over the Arno are four stone bridges.

The number of houses in Florence is reckoned at 9000, containing about 80,000 inhabitants. It has 152 churches, besides 89 convents of both sexes, 17 public squares, &c. It is the see of an archbishop, and has an university.

It would require a volume to describe the beauties of this city. The Palais Pitti, where the grand duke resides, the gallery, the cathedral, the tower of Giotto, and the Baptistery, are edifices which particularly attract the attention of the stranger. In the courts of the Palais Pitti (which is of the Rustic order, and has a very striking effect) are some very curious statues; and in the apartments may be seen many very beautiful pictures, especially the celebrated painting of Raphael called the Madonna della Sedia, as well as a great number of other excellent pieces by the same master, by Guido, Guercino, Andrea del Sarto, Parmegiano, Pietro Cortona, &c. Towards the gardens of the palace is another very elegant front. In the gardens of Boboli, which join the Palais Pitti, are some very fine statues; and amongst others, one of a man bearing upon his shoulders a vase from which he pours water, by Giovanni di Bologna; a statue of Neptune in a shell of Egyptian granite, of one single piece 36 feet in circumference; and above all, the group of Adam and Eve, full of expression, by Michael Angelo Nacarini. In the same gardens of Boboli is a managerie, where are ostriches, and some sheep whose tails weighed 30 pounds. In the cathedral the dome is particularly to be remarked, as well as the bas relief round the choir. From the top of the square tower del Giotto, which is cased with white marble, you may see all the environs of Florence, and which form several points of view as agreeable as they are surprising. Near the cathedral is a building called the Baptistery, whose gates of brass exhibit sculpture very curiously executed by Lorenzo Ghiberti. Besides the statues which are at the gate, and in the court of the old palace (amongst which are those of David; by Michael Angelo; the rape of a Sabine in marble, by Giovanni di Bologna; and the Perseus in brass, by the famous Benvenuto Cellini), there are some very elegant ones within, particularly in the council-chamber. In the church of the Carmelites is the chapel of the Corsini, where are two fine bas reliefs by Fugini, and the cupola is painted by Luca Giordano. There are also some excellent pictures of Masaccio, painted above 300 years ago. The great altar in the church of the Holy Ghost is an exquisite piece of architecture. At San Lorenzo the magnificent chapel of the Medicis is much admired, as well as the repository of the tombs, which contains some very fine statues by Michael Angelo, who also executed the architecture of the library. The windows of the library are very beautifully painted. The church of St. Mark deserves likewise to be seen: the Dominicans vend exquisite perfumes there. In various places of the city are to be seen very curious pieces of architecture and of sculpture; such as the palaces Riccardi and Corsini, the Doric column, the Place Ducale, the bas relievo of a pedestal by Bandinelli, the Place San Lorenzo, the Centaur slain by Hercules, by Giovanni di Bologna, &c.

The gallery is full of master-pieces of sculpture. Among the curious ancient statues are those of Diana, Venus after bathing, Venus Genitrix, Venus Victrix, formerly in the Tribuna, the Athleta, Cupid and Psyche, Ganymede, Bacchus and Faunus, Venus and Mars, Endymion, Pomona, Mercury, Leda, Hercules wrestling with the Centaur, a Bacchante, extremely light; two Agrippinas sitting, an Etruscan idol, an Etruscan prince, or Lucomone. Amongst the works of modern artists, you will admire the Bacchus of Michael Angelo, and the famous copy of the Laocoon by Bandinelli. In one of the apartments of the gallery which is called the Tribuna, are the statues of the Venus de Medicis, Venus Pudica, a dancing Faunus, the wrestlers, the whetter, the famous picture of Venus by Titian, representing his wife naked in that character; St. John in the wilderness, by Raphael; a small Madona kneeling, by Correggio; and many pieces of Rubens and other great masters.

In another apartment, also adjoining to the gallery, is the curious cabinet of Greek and Latin medals and medallions in brass, which contains one of the best series in Europe, as well as a fine collection of cameos and intaglios; and on one side in the Painter's hall is the beautiful statue of Venus coming out of the bath. The elegant bridge of the Trinity, which has served as a model for the bridge of Neuilly near Paris, likewise merits attention.

About two miles from Florence is the Poggio Imperiale, where are some excellent pictures, and a marble statue of Adonis, by Michael Angelo.

Six miles from Florence, in the gardens called the Pratolino, is a statue of the Appennines, 60 feet high in proportion, and several grottos with curious fountains.

The grand duke has removed hither from the Villa Medici, at Rome, the famous groupe of Niobe, an astonishing performance, attributed to Scopas, and has built a room in the gallery on purpose for it. He has likewise removed the Apollo from the Villa Medici, to place him by the famous Venus of the Tribuna, and also the Venus coming out of the bath, which is in the Painters hall.

In the room where you see the map of Tuscany is an antique hermaphrodite, which, in the opinion of some, is not inferior to that of the Villa Borghese.

There are many very capital buildings in Florence; amongst others, that of the marquis Riccardi, the duke Strozzi, and prince Corsini.

To the W. of Florence lies the extensive and fruitful valley watered by the Arno, as far as Pisa and the Tuscan sea. It lies 52 miles S. of Bologna, 47 E. of Leghorn and the Tuscan sea, and 144 N. of Rome. Lat. 43, 34, N. Long. 12, 24 E.

FLORENNES, a town of the French Netherlands. It lies 22 miles S. W. of Namur. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 4, 20, E.

FLORENT LE VIEL, (St.) a town of France, in Anjou, seated on the banks of the river Loire, 20 miles from Angiers, with a rich Benedictine abbey.

FLORENTIN, (St.) a small town of Upper Champagne, in France, on the river Armançon. It lies 25 miles S. W. of Troyes. Lat. 47, 43, N. Long. 3, 45, E.

FLORES, or, as the Portuguese stile it, ILHA DE FLORES; one of the Azores; an island so called from the variety of fine flowers produced in it, being 10 miles long, and three broad. It lies almost mid-way between Europe and America. Here also is plenty of wood, as well as corn and other fruits, &c. It is subject to Portugal. Lat. 39, 12, N. Long. 32, 10, E.

FLORES, an island in the Indian ocean, in Asia, 50 leagues long, and 18 broad, the inhabitants of which, it is said, are infamous for the art of poisoning.

FLORIDA, a country situated on the E. side of the Mississippi-river, and extending to the frontiers of Carolina and Georgia, and forms an extensive peninsula from lat. 25 to 31; discovered by Cabot in 1497, and was possessed by the Spaniards in in 1512, but by the cruelties exercised on the natives, it soon became a desert, and the small number of settlements Spain formed here, which they never peopled, served less to make any advantage of the country, than to hinder another nation from settling in it; and she was obliged in 1763, at the peace, to yield it to Great-Britain, who divided it into colonies or governments, under the name of East and West Florida, whose limits were settled by proclamation, Oct. 7, 1763.

FLORIDA, (East,) comprehends all the peninsula; it is bounded on the N. by Georgia, and on the W. by the river Apalachiola. It contains 12,000,000 of acres, which is about the quantity of Ireland. Its soil, except in the middle, is very low, and cut into lakes and rivers full of fish, the trees which cover it are not close together, as in the American forests, but at a distance from each other, without any underwood. The shores are sandy or marshy to a great distance within land. The agitation of the waters violently attacking with a continual force its southern extremity, which they incessantly wear away, has divided it into a great number of islands, keys, banks, and rocks, whose mass bending from the W. towards the N. has followed the direction of the current. These separations, in which are formed several channels for small vessels, were named by the Spaniards, The Islands and Keys of the Martyrs. Besides the situation of this colony between two seas, renders the air colder, and the rains more frequent than in the neighbouring parts of the continent. The mildness of the seasons, and the wholesome quality of the climate, became a proverb among its first masters, who use to resort thither from the Havannah, Vera Cruz, and several other places, for the recovery of their impaired healths.

The country abounds with all sorts of timber and fruit-trees, especially oaks, firs, and pines, but these last without bearing fruit, nut-trees, small cherry-trees, mulberry-trees, both white and red, which grow here much larger than in any other part of America, mahogany, walnut, maple, ash, lentiques, limes, chefnuts, cedar, laurel, and palm-trees, with vines, which grow naturally, of which last is a kind whose grapes are larger betwixt the two tropics, and it is reckoned as good as our manchet, and six times cheaper. Also others that serve for dying, as fustic, braziletto, logwood, &c. the sassafras and tolu-tree used in physic, the magnolia, tulip-laurel, the tupeloy-tree, &c. are become the greatest ornaments of gardens; and other shrubs which may become of great consequence in trade, such as the myrtle wax shrub, which grows in every soil, the opuntia or cochineal fig-tree, the fenna shrub, &c. to this may be added, that East-Florida has the greatest part of the fruit-trees of the New World, and almost all those of Europe succeed wonderfully there; where also may be cultivated to advantage not only all the productions of the Antilles, but likewise silk, indigo, and vines.

In 1772, they exported from this colony 30,000 weight of indigo, of an excellent quality. It is the only English settlement that produces much of the plant called barilla or kali, with which pearl-ashes are made, and of which the English import a considerable quantity for manufacturing glass, soap, &c. All the shores and overflowed land are covered with it. When this country was yielded to England, it was desolate in some degree, and as yet it contains but a small number of planters. One of the most flourishing settlements is Mr. Boll's, which is S. of St. Augustine, the capital of the colony. In 1770, E. Florida received 50 sloops, and fitted out 52; so flourishing was it in its infant state. Its ancient inhabitants were exterminated by the Creeks, a savage nation, who lived farther in-land.

Here is a sort of grain like our oats, and when rightly prepared, exceeds our best oatmeal. It grows spontaneously in marshy places, and by the sides of rivers, like rushes. The Indians, when it is ripe, take handfuls, and shake them into their canoes, and what escapes them, falling into the water, produces without any farther trouble, the next year's crop. In Florida they have also the tunas, a most delicious food, especially in hot weather, and so wholesome, that, when ripe, Europeans call it the cordial julap.

There is good beef, veal, and mutton, with plenty of hogs, especially on the sea-coast, acorns, cocoa-nuts and other masts. Here are not only cattle for draught of the Tartar breed, but horses for the saddle, the latter incredibly cheap. Every where on this coast is shelter for vessels, and sometimes a little fishing and hunting. It appears that few savages inhabit this part of the country. But this coast is the kingdom, as it were, of oysters, as the great bank of Newfoundland, the gulph and river of St. Laurence, are that of cod and haddock. All the low-lands on the coast, as far as they can be approached, are bordered with mangler-trees, to which adhere a prodigious quantity of small oysters, of an exquisite taste. Others a great deal larger, and not so delicious, are to be met with in the sea; and that in such numbers, that they form shelves therein, which at first one takes for rocks level with the surface of the water. See MARTYRS.

gulf of Mexico on the S. on the N. by the 31st parallel of latitude, and on the W. by the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, and the river Mississippi. It is a long land of more than 80 leagues, in which settlements are enclosed, yielded to Great Britain at the peace in 1763. The climate is very hot, damp, and unhealthy, particularly near the sea; the strand takes up a great depth, it is a white and dry sand. As you advance into the country which is tolerably even, the climate becomes more healthy, and the lands more fruitful; they get every year two harvests of maize, and have very good pastures with plenty of cattle. The trees and plants are nearly the same as in East Florida, but this affords several articles which are wanted there. The inland parts are also much better.

Pearls are to be found here in great abundance; but the Indians value our beads more. Upon the whole coast, for 200 leagues, are several vast beds of oysters; and in the fresh-water lakes and rivers is a sort of shell-fish between a muscle and a pearl-oyster, in which is found abundance of pearls, and many larger than ordinary; and on the coast they often gather ambergris. Here are two sorts of cochineal; one the wild sort, which is far inferior to what is cultivated in the gardens and fields; and the plant of which indigo is made, is very common in most of the S. parts of this province. Here is to be found also, especially after high S. winds, a sort of stone pitch, which the Spaniards, who call it copea, moisten with grease, and use it for their vessels in the nature of pitch, than which they say it is much better in hot countries, it not being apt to melt.

The high grounds contain mines of copper, iron, lead, and coal, and they find orpiment and sandarac in several places. Great part of the inhabitants are French, who build ships and cultivate rice, cotton, and indigo. Their cotton is very fine, of a bright white, and their indigo is more brilliant than that from St. Domingo. The inhabitants of this colony amount to about 6000; but they have lately increased rapidly towards the Mississippi. At present their chief trade is in furs and wood for dying and building. In 1768, their exports amounted 10,495*l.* the year following to 10,806*l.* In 1770, 30 vessels entered their ports, and they fitted out 41.

On the banks of the Mississippi are several springs and lakes, which produce excellent salt. The plants producing hemp and flax are very common in this country; and that sort of silk-grass, of which are made such stuffs as come from the East-Indies, called herb-stuffs. Vast flights of pigeons come hither at certain seasons of the year, for above a league in length, and half as broad, which roost on the trees in such numbers, that they often break down the branches. In many places are mines of pit-coal, and iron-ore is often found near the surface of the earth, whence a metal is extracted little inferior to steel. Here are also some mines of quicksilver, or rather the mineral from which it is extracted, and only used by the natives to paint their faces and bodies in time of war, or high festivals.

With regard to the rivers that do not communicate with the Mississippi, only two large ones are betwixt it and the peninsula of Florida, namely, the Coza, Coussa, or Mobile, and Palache. The distance between these two rivers to the E. is about 190 miles; and the coast between them is very deep and bold. The chief harbour betwixt them also, and indeed upon all this coast of the gulf of Mexico, is Pensacola. The other places in Florida may be seen under their respective names. In 1780, the Spaniards became masters of this province.

FLOTZ, a town of Turkey in Europe, and in Walachia, seated on the river Genissa, near the place where it falls into the Danube.

FLOUR, (St.) the capital of Upper Auvergne, in France. It stands on a mountain which is difficult of access, and the see of a bishop. It lies 46 miles S. of Clermont. Lat. 45, 10, N. Long. 2, 15 E.

FLUMS, a place in the Thurgau, in Switzerland, about a league from Wahlstadt, on the river Setz. Here is a considerable foundery for making of steel, which is a composition made of three sorts of metal, dug out of Mount Guntzen in the neighbourhood, and of which two only serve for making of iron.

FLUSHING, in Dutch Vlissingen, a well-fortified town of Zealand, at the mouth of the Hondt or Western Scheld, defending not only the passage into it, but also to the isles of Zealand, and even into Flanders by sea. Its harbour, which is large and secure, lies between two moles or dykes on the S. coast of the isle of Walcheren, and by two canals; the sea runs quite up to the other end of the town, so that loaded vessels come up to the merchants doors. Besides other fine structures, the town house is a magnificent and regular pile; the houses in general are well-built, and here is a very good foreign trade.

This was one of the first cities that declared for the States, after seizing of the Brill, as likewise one of the cautionary towns delivered up to queen Elizabeth by the States as a pledge of their fidelity, and also security for the money that princess had expended in assisting them against the Spaniards, and of which the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney was governor in 1585; but was redeemed again in 1616, under king James I.'s reign, by the famous Barnevolt's negotiations, for an inconsiderable sum, less a great deal than the money they stood indebted to England. It belongs to the Prince of Orange. It lies eight miles S. of Middleburg, and 17 N. N. E. of Sluys. Lat. 51, 25, N. Long. 3, 30, E.

FOA, or FUOA, a considerable populous city of Lower Egypt, or the Delta, in Africa, anciently called Nilos, and by the Greeks Metelis, upon the E. bank of the river Nile. Its streets are narrow and ill-built. Once European factors resided here; but the frequent plundering of their boats by the Arabs, made them remove to Rosetto, which is about 30 miles lower down on the river. It lies near the town of Dierout, and S. of Fezzara. The neighbouring territory is fertile, and full of gardens and orchards:

FOCHIA NOVA, a town of Natolia, in Asia, and in the province of Sarchan, seated on the gulph of Sanderly, with a good harbour, and a castle. The Venetians defeated the Turkish fleet near this place in 1650.

FODDZIA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Capitanato; seated near the river Cerbero, 10 miles E. of Manfredonia.

FODWAR, a town of Hungary, over against Colocza, on the other side the Danube. Long. 19, 20, E. Lat. 46, 45, N.

FOGARS, a well-inhabited town of Transylvania, and kingdom of Hungary. It lies on the river Aluta, and is defended by a strong fort, which was to no purpose attempted by the Turks in 1661. Lat. 46, 46, N. Long. 24, 18, E.

FOGLIA, a river of Italy which rises on the confines of Tuscany, crosses the duchy of Urbino, and falls into the gulph of Venice at Pi-faro.

FOGO, one of the Cape de Verd islands upon the coast of Africa, and in the Atlantic ocean; it is subject to Portugal. It has its name from a volcano in which it frequently emits flame. It lies 320 miles W. of Cape de Verd. Lat. 14, 38, N. Long. 24, 12, W.

FOIA, an ancient town of Natolia in Asia, seated on the gulph of Smyrna, 30 miles N. of the city of that name. It is still considerable for the goodness of its harbour, and the strong castle that defends it.

FOIX, a district or county of France, encompassed by Languedoc on the N. and E. It is bounded by Rouffillon on the S. and by the Pyrenean mountains, which separates it from Catalonia. It belongs to the crown of France.

FOIX, in Latin, Fuxium, the capital of the last mentioned county. It lies on the river Auriege, at the foot of the Pyrennees. The assembly of the states meet here, and it has a fine abbey, whose abbot has the next place in it after the bishop of Pamiers, who is president. It lies 38 miles S. of Thoulouse, and about 20 from the confines of Spain to the N. Lat. 43, 27, N. Long. 1, 25, E.

FO-KIEN, a maritime province of China, in Asia. It has the ocean on the S. E. is bounded on the S. W. by Quang-tung, and on the N. by Cheki-ang and Kiangsi. This country extends from lat. 23, 40, to 28, 20, N. and from long. 116 to 121, E. It is very populous, and well situated for trade. They export diamonds and other gems, with gold, cinnamon, pepper, cloves, amber, coral, &c. to a considerable advantage. The soil is rich, producing vast quantities of rice and other corn, with variety of fruits, &c. The climate, though sultry in summer, is serene and healthy.

FO-KIEN, FO-CHEU, or FU-CHEU, the capital of the last-mentioned province, at the mouth of the river Min, where is formed a very capacious harbour for the largest vessels to come close to the walls. It is one of the noblest cities in China for magnificent buildings, number of rich merchants, and a bridge of above 100 stately arches of white stone across the bay. The viceroy resides here. Besides its foreign traffic with Japan, the Philippines, Siam, &c. and its common manufactures of silk, cotton, &c. they make prodigious quantities of white sugar. It lies on the Indian ocean, opposite to the island of Formosa, 381 miles N. E. of Canton. Lat. 26 32, N. Long. 113, 12, E.

FOKO, on the coast of South Guinea, is an island in Calvary river, which being pretty high, serves as a mark from the sea to know the river. The town of Foko is some leagues up the river on the W. side of it; and there being other villages along the river, on the E. and W. all inhabited by a very good sort of blacks, any one may safely venture to trade either for slaves, teeth, or provisions. Foko supplies us with fresh water and wood, the former from a pond near the town, which keeps well at sea. They also furnish us with yams and bananas, at the proper seasons, at reasonable rates.

FOLIGNI, or FULIGNO, anciently Fulginium, a famous municipal town in the time of the Romans, now a small Episcopal city of Spoleto, one of the Ecclesiastical States, in the Middle Division of Italy. It is most delightfully situated, on the river Tubino, at the foot of the Appennines. In the great piazza are stately buildings. Its traffic principally consists in cloth, gold and silver lace, sweet-meats, silks, &c. all manufactured within its walls. It has a fair in April, which lasts a month.

month. The cathedral is a fine building, with a sumptuous cupola, and ornamented to the amount of 30,000 crowns. One of its two gates has basso relievos and inscriptions commemorating the noble stand its citizens made at it against the Lombards, whom they drove from their country. It lies 15 miles N. of Spoleto city. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 13, 38, E.

FOLKINGHAM, or FOKINGHAM, a town of Lincolnshire, standing on a pleasant eminence, 107 miles from London. Near it are the ruins of two magnificent structures; namely, Sempringham monastery, and the ancient seat of lord Clinton, queen Elizabeth's admiral. Its market is on Thursdays; and fairs, Ash-Wednesdays, May-day, June 16, July 3, and November 10 and 22.

FOLKESTONE, in Kent, between Dover and Hythe, a member of the cinque-port of Dover, 72 miles from London, appears to have been a very ancient place, from the Roman coins and British bricks often found in it. Here was formerly a nunnery, but so near the coast, that it was often pillaged by the Danes, and at last swallowed up by the sea. Here is a charity-school for 20 boys. A copious spring runs through the town; but it is of most note for the multitude of fishing-boats that belong to its harbour, which are employed at the season in catching mackerel for London, to which place they are carried in very fine cutters, that at other times are employed in smuggling, which is the chief support of the town; and in war time, privateering. There is a ridge of chalky rocks, all the way from hence to Dover; and it has been observed of some of them, that they have visibly sunk and grown lower. There are yet visible some ruins of a fort in the S. part of the town, built 700 years ago, by one of the governors of Dover castle; and upon a hill in this town, yet called Castle hill, was a watch-tower. The market on Wednesday, and a fair on June 28. Dr. Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, was born at this town.

FONCETT, a village in Suffolk, with a fair on September 11, for toys.

FONCHAL. See FUNCHFAL.

FONDI, or FUNDI, a small Episcopal see under Capua, in the Lavoro, a province of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is but thinly peopled, from the insalubrity of the air from the lake of its name near it. Fondi confines on the Ecclesiastical territory, and in 1551 was roughly handled by the famous Turkish admiral Hardiadeni Barbarossa. It lies 40 miles N. W. of Capua.

FONDI, (lake of) in Latin Lacus Fondanus, lying between the last-mentioned town and the gulph of Gaeta. It is said to have been formerly larger, not exceeding at present four miles, though sometimes swelled very much by the sea, when driven furiously upon that coast.

FONIA, a kingdom of Africa, on the S. side of the river Gambia, whose inhabitants are a wild sort of people, called Floops. Their country is of a vast extent; but they have no king or chief; and their towns are fortified with stakes drove all round them, and filled up with clay. They are a very courageous people, and keep the Mundingoes, their enemies, in awe.

FONTAINBLEAU, or FONS BLAUDI, from a spring here so called. It stands in the middle of a spacious forest, anciently that of Bierre, now of the same name, in the Isle of France. Near it is a large royal palace, richly ornamented with paintings and sculpture; also four gardens adorned with statues and fountains. The parochial church of Fontainebleau has fine paintings. It lies 28 miles S. E. of Paris. Lat. 48, 36, N. Long. 2, 47, E.

FONTAINE L'EVEQUE, in Latin Fons Episcopi, a small city of French Hainault, confining on Namur, near the river Sombre. It was ceded to the French in 1667. It lies 12 miles from Mons to the N. W. and about six from Charleroy to the N. E.

FONTENAI-LE-COMTE, the capital of Lower Poitou, in France, on the river Vendee. It is small, but well built, with a pretty good trade. Here cloth and several woollen stuffs are manufactured. It lies 39 miles W. of Poitiers, and seven leagues from the sea-coast. Lat. 46, 31, N. Long. 0, 47, W.

FONTENOY, a town of Hainault in the Austrian Netherlands, confining on Flanders, where a battle was fought May 1, 1745, between the French, commanded by marshal count Saxe, and the allies under his Royal Highness William duke of Cumberland; in which the latter were obliged to retreat. It lies three miles S. E. of Tournay, and 16 N. W. of Mons. Lat. 50, 37, N. Long. 3, 24, E.

FONTERABIA, or FUENTARABIA, contracted from Fuenterrabaya, i. e. strand of the fountain, the only city of Guipuscoa and Biscay, in Spain, near the Pyrennees, with a pretty good harbour at the mouth of the Bidassoa, or Idaza, which river is here pretty broad, and the boundary between France and Spain. Though small, it is well fortified, containing about 200 houses in one parish. By the river here is formed the Isle of Pheasants. It lies 18 miles W. of Bayonne. In 1638 it held out a siege against the French; but in 1718 they took it, and restored it the following year. Lat. 43, 27, N. Long. 1, 38, W.

FONTEVRAUT, or rather FRONTEVAUT, a small town of Anjou, in France, confining on Tourain, Touraine, about a league from the Loire, and three from Saumar, to the N. E. Here is a famous abbey of maidens, the abbess of which is general of the order.

F O

FORA, or VOOREN, an island of Sleswick in Denmark, N. E. of Amron, between Northstrand and Sylt; about six miles long and four broad. It abounds in cattle and corn, and contains upwards of 4000 inhabitants, with several villages. The inhabitants retain the language and manners of the ancient Frisians, though some speak Low Saxon.

FORALONES, in the island of Gunra, in South America, and empire of Peru, are old walls of some ancient building in the time of the Yncas, which serve here as light-houses for the shipping which sail from Callao to Paita, on the South-sea coast.

FORBISHER'S-STRAIT, so called from the discoverer of it, Martin Forbisher, who in the year 1578 found it out, in lat. 62, N.

FORCABUS, commonly pronounced Fochabus, a town not far from the banks of the Spey, in Bamfshire, in Scotland. It consists principally of one long street, about half a mile long, and straggling houses, with a handsome tolbooth in the middle of the town. The fine seat of Gordon castle, belonging to the duke of Gordon, stands in its neighbourhood, a little E. of it.

FORCALQUIER, in Latin Forum Calcarium, the capital of a county of its name, in Provence, in France, on the brook Laye. It lies in a very fruitful country watered by several rivulets, 27 miles N. of Aix. Lat. 44, 12, N. Long. 5, 41, E.

FORCHAIN, a town in the circle of Franconia, in Germany, upon the river Regnitz. It lies 18 miles S. of Bamberg, to the bishop of which it is subject. Lat. 49, 41, N. Long. 10, 56, E.

FORDHAM, a manor in the county of Westchester, and province of New York.

FORDINGRIDGE, a town of Hampshire, whose market is deserted, but it has a fair. It is 26 miles S. W. of Winchester, and 85 W. by S. of London. Long. 1, 50, W. Lat. 50, 52, N.

FORDUN, a market town of Kincardineshire, or shire of Mearns, in the middle division of Scotland.

FORELAND-NORTH, in Kent, in the Isle of Thanet, of which it is the N. E. point, is the promontory by act of parliament ascertained to be the most southern part of the port of London, which is thereby extended N. in a right line to the point called the Nafe, on the coast of Essex, and forms that properly called the mouth of the Thames. A sea-mark was erected here by the Trinity-house corporation at the public expence, which is a round brick tower, near 80 feet high. The sea gains so much upon the land here, by the winds at S. W. that in a few years past above 30 acres of land have been lost in one place. All vessels that pass on the S. side of this head-land are said to enter the channel, which is the narrow sea between England and France.

FORELAND-SOUTH, in Kent, a head of land forming the E. point of the Kentish shore, and called South, in respect to its bearing from the other Foreland, which is about six miles to the N. Its situation is of great security to the Downs, the road between both, which would be a very wild and dangerous road for ships, did not this point break the sea off, which would otherwise come rolling up from the W. to the Flats, or bank of sands, which, for three leagues together, and at about a league or a league and a half from the shore, run parallel with it, and are dry at low water; so that these two capes breaking all the force of the sea on the S. E. and S. W. make the Downs, accounted a good road, except when the wind blows excessive hard from S. E. E. by N. or E. N. E. when ships in the Downs are drove from their anchors, and often run ashore, or are forced on the sands, or into Sandwich bay, or Ramsgate pier.

FOREST, a parliament town of Scotland, in the shire of Murray, 30 miles W. of Elgin. Long. 3, 20, W. Lat. 57, 40, N.

FOREST, (Black). See BLACK-FOREST.

FOREST-ROW, a village in Suffex, with two fairs, on June 25, and October 28.

FOREZ, a small territory of Lyonnois, in France; it has the mountains of Auvergne to the W. Velay to the S. other mountains to the E. which part it from Lyonnois, and Bourbonnois to the N. This is a fruitful valley, watered by several small rivers which run into the Loire, which traverses Forez from N. to S. It is divided into Upper and Lower Forez. The capital of the whole country is Montbrison.

FORFAR, a town of Scotland, and capital of a county of the same name, situated in W. long. 2, 23. N. lat. 56, 25; of which Mr. Pennant gives the following account: It contains about 2000 souls; but since the great æra of the prosperity of North Britain, has increased above one half. The manufactures of linens in this neighbourhood, from fourpence to sevenpence a-yard, are very considerable, and bring in, as is said, near 20,000l. a-year. The castle stood on a small hill near the town, but at present not a fragment is left. The lake lies, or rather did lie, at a small distance from the castle; and, according to tradition, once surrounded the town; there being in several parts, even to this day, marks of the deserted channel.

Of late years it has been very considerably reduced by draining; to which the vast quantity of fine marle at the bottom was the temptation. This fine manure is found there in strata from three to 10 feet thick, and very often is met with beneath the peat in the moors. The land improved with it yields four crops successively; after which it is laid down with barley and clover.

Forfar is a parliament town, classed with Perth, Dundee, Coupar, and St. Andrew's, which all together send one member to parliament.

FORFARSHIRE, a county of Scotland, of which Forfar is the capital. Including Angus, Glenila, Glenesk, and Glenpraffin, it extends 29 miles from E. to W. and 16 where broadest, though in some places the breadth does not exceed five miles. On the N. it is divided from the Brae of Mar, by a ridge of the Binnchinnen mountains; it is bounded on the S. by the frith of Tay and the British ocean, on the E. by Mearns, and on the W. by Perthshire. Part of the Grampian mountains runs through this country, which is agreeably diversified with hill and dale. It produces lead and iron in abundance, together with quarries of freestone and slate, with which the inhabitants drive a considerable traffic. The country is well watered, shaded with large forests, and adorned with fine seats and plantations. Their heaths and woods abound with hart, hind, roebuck, and moor-game; their streams are stocked with trout and salmon.

The mountains to the W. and N. are inhabited by Highlanders, but the Lowlanders possess the towns and champaign country. The common people are sober, numerous, and addicted to traffic. Forfarshire exhibits many monuments of antiquity. At the village of Miggle, in the neighbourhood of Coupar, there are several stones erected in the church-yard, embellished with the figures of different animals and other ornaments. In the church-yard of Glamis, we see an old obelisk or entire stone of 16 feet high, set up over the grave of king Malcolm II. who was murdered by the connivance of his own domestics. This stone is engraved with a number of figures alluding to the regicide; and at a little distance, within the park of Glamis, there is another stone marked with hieroglyphical symbols, which seem to express the perpetration of the same murder. At the village of Cossens, in the same neighbourhood, a very curious obelisk appears lying in the fields; it is known by the name of St. Orland's stone, and exhibits a great variety of figures in bas relief. There is another small stone inscribed with figures at Balutheren, in the neighbourhood of Dundee.

F O

At the distance of a mile to the S. of Glamis, stands Denoon-castle, upon an eminence, environed with steep rocks almost inaccessible, having on the N. two or three rows of terraces. It is built in a semicircular form, encompassed with a stupendous wall of stone and earth 27 feet high, and 30 feet in thickness. It has two entries, one to the S. E. and another to the N. The whole circumference of the wall amounts to 335 yards; and within this area, the ruins of ancient buildings are still visible. About four miles to the S. of Brechin, at a place called Aberlemny, we find four or five ancient obelisks, one of which is engraved with figures, supposed to be monuments of a great victory gained at the village of Luncarty, by the Scots over the Danes; a victory entirely owing to the valour of an husbandman and his two sons, of the surname of Hay who were ennobled for their prowess by king King Kenneth III. From these descended the earls of Errol, hereditary high-constables of Scotland.

FORFICHEN. See TORFICHEN.

FORGES, a town of Normandy in France, famous for its mineral springs: It lies on the river Andelle, and about three leagues from Neufchatel.

FORLI, an episcopal town of Romagna, in the Middle Division of Italy, on the river Montone; not far from it stood the ancient Forum Livii. Its territory about 46 miles round, is extremely fertile. Its see is under that of Ravenna, and the place is rather rich in churches and monasteries than in palaces. It has produced many learned men, and lies 18 miles S. W. of Ravenna. Lat. 44. 32, N. Long. 12, 47, E.

FORLIMPOPOLI, anciently Forum Popilii, or Pompilii, was once a considerable place of Romagna, in the Ecclesiastical State, in Italy, but having been destroyed by the ravages of war, the bishopric was translated to Bertinoro. It stands on the road to Forli, about eight miles east of it.

FORMARTEN, one of the subdivisions of Aberdeenshire, in the N. of Scotland. It extends above eight miles on the coast from the river Don on the S. to that of Ythan on the N. It has Mar to the S. Garioch to the W. and Buchan to the N. It is a populous district, and has a good fruitful soil, but no town of any note.

FOMOSA, or HERMOSA, the most considerable island belonging to Fokien in China, in Asia. It lies in the Indian ocean, between lat. 22 and 25, N. and between long. 119 and 122 E. being computed about 70 leagues in length from N. to S. and about 93 in breadth. Its coasts are rocky and high, without havens or sea-ports, there being but one bay in the whole island; namely, Tyowang, from from which the Dutch were routed by Coxinga, for treacherously seizing on a vessel loaded with treasure to pay his army with.

FORRESS, a town of Murrayland, or shire of Elgin, in the N. of Scotland. It lies pleasantly at the end of a ridge of several mountains, on a rivulet that falls into the water of Findorn. It is joined in the district of royal burghs with Inverness, Nairn, and Fortrose, which alternately send one member to the British parliament. Here are the ruins of a royal palace. It is the seat of a presbytery, containing 10 parishes. A little to the E. of this place, in the corn fields, is a flat square pillar of stone, which some authors describe minutely, and mention hieroglyphics in compartments, &c. It is a rude stone without any inscription, about 23 feet above ground, and 12 or 15 below, and, as it said, all of one piece. The tradition about it is various; but Camden says, it was erected in memory of a victory, which king Malcolm Mackenneth obtained over Sueno king of Denmark. It lies 12 miles from Elgin on the E. and upwards of 34 from Inverness on the W.

FORSHEIM, or FORTXHEIM, a strong town of Franconia in Germany, and the Licoritum of the ancients, situated at the confluence of the Wisent and Rednitz. The Swedes under the duke of Weymar took it in 1633, at the first onset. Its parish-church of St. Martin, is collegiate. According to popular tradition, this was the native place of Pontius Pilate the Roman governor of Judea. It lies 10 miles S. E. of Bamberg.

FORT-AUGUSTUS, a fortress and garrison in the district called Kilichuymman, and parish of Boleiskine, at the western end of Lough-nefs. It lies 36 miles W. of Inverness. The malcontents in 1745, took and demolished it. Other forts in Scotland, as Fort-George, and Fort-William, see under ARDERSEAR, INVERNESS, and INNER-LOCHY, or WILLIAM-FORT, and those in other countries under their proper names.

FORT-DE-FUENTES, a fort of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, seated on the mountain of Montecchio at the confluence of the river Adda with the lake Como. Long. 9, 0, E. Lat. 46, 5, N.

FORTEVENTURA, an island of the Atlantic ocean, and one of the Canaries, 65 miles in length, and of a very irregular breadth, consisting of two peninsulas joined by an isthmus 12 miles in breadth. It produces plenty of wheat and barley, as also beeves and goats. It belongs to the Spaniards.

FORTH, (river of,) in Stirlingshire, the ancient Bodotria, is one of the most famous, though not the largest river in Scotland. It rises near the foot of mount Lomond, and with a course from W. to E. falls into the frith of its own name or frith of Edinburgh.

F O

FORT-LEWIS, a strong place of France, in Alsace, built by Lewis XIV. in an isle formed by the Rhine, 20 miles N. E. from Strasburg, and 267 E. of Paris. Long. 8, 9, E. Lat. 48, 48, N.

FORT-LEWIS, a fort of America in the island of Cayenne, built by the French in 1643.

FORTNOVA, or FORNOVA, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, eight miles S. W. of Parma, remarkable for a battle gained here by the French over the Italians in 1495. Long. 10, 1, E. Lat. 44, 44, N.

FORTROSE, the civil name of Channery, which see; a town on the Murray-frith, in Ross-shire, and N. of Scotland, which is joined in a district with the royal burghs of Forreß, Inverness, and Nairn, to send by turns one member to the British parliament. The sheriff and Michaelmas courts sit here alternately, with Tayne and Dingwall.

FORT-ROYAL, the capital of Grenada, one of the Caribbee-islands, in the West-Indies, which lies at the bottom of a spacious harbour, that is capable of containing 25 ships of the line with ease and in perfect security. It is situated at the S. W. end of the island, where the seat of government is fixed, which retains the French division of the island into seven quarters or parishes.

FORT-ROYAL, one of the principal towns in the island of Martinico, in the West-Indies. It is the seat of government in the island; its streets are regular, and houses agreeable and the inhabitants addicted to luxury. To the east of the town, on a neck of land, is an irregular fort, badly built, and worse designed, which gives name to the town it poorly defends. Since the peace the French have built a citadel, which has cost 325,000l. Its harbour, where the men of war winter, is one of the best in the West-Indies.

FORTUNE-ISLAND, in the West-Indies, in the windward-passage, is not three leagues long; the land is even, and covered with bushes, as are almost all the other islands hereabouts. It is separated from Crooked-Isle by a channel one league wide, with two little islands, behind which you will perceive a great extent of sea, with three other little islands.

Near Fortune-Island, are broken rocks, which look like huts built by shipwrecked people, which is too often the case hereabouts. In 1755, the French bark, the Eagle, belonging to the king, being deceived by these huts, went to an anchor about 10 or 12 cables length from the S. point, and sent the boat on shore. She found it bad anchoring; but in the bay, towards the N. part of the island, is tolerable anchoring pretty near the land, from 40 to 10 fathoms water.

From

F O

From the N. E. point of Fortune-Island, to the northernmost point of Crooked-Island, the distance is six leagues and a half. Between them is a bay, in the form of a semi-circle in which is good anchorage under either of the islands, and shelter from N. E. and S. winds.

FORTUNE-ISLES, in the Pacific Ocean were discovered by Kerguelen, in 1771. They abound with water but have no wood, or inhabitants, and are situated in lat. 40, 8, N. Long. 0, 62, E.

FORZA-DE-AGRO, a town of Sicily, in the Val-di-Demona, seated on a craggy rock, near a rivulet, 20 miles from Messina.

FOSSANO, FOSSANUM, so called from some medicinal springs in its neighbourhood, a small episcopal town of Chierasco and Piemont, in Upper Italy, on the river Stura. It lies 20 miles N. E. of Coni, and 21 S. E. of Turin. Lat. 44, 48, N. Long. 7, 41, E.

FOSSANOVA, a town of the Campania di Roma, in the Middle Division of Italy, on the river Evola, at the foot of some hills, confining on Naples. It lies about two miles from Piperno, and the Pomptino-fens, also 50 S. E. of Rome.

FOSSIGNY, a lordship of Savoy, in Upper Italy, in which lie the mountains of Glacieres, Maudite and Plainejou.

FOSSOMBRONE, a small episcopal city of Urbino, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy; it was built from the ruins of the Forum Sempronii, half a mile off, destroyed by the Goths and Lombards. Here is a castle. It lies 12 miles S. E. of the city of Urbino. Lat. 43, 46, N. Long. 14, 10, E.

FOSSE, a river of Yorkshire, joining the Ouse, at the castle in the capital of that county.

FOSSE, or LEVEN, a river in Lancashire which runs into the Irish sea at Leven-Sands.

FOTHERINGHAY-CASTLE, in Northamptonshire, in which Mary queen of Scots was beheaded, is on the S. E. side of King's-Cliff, near the river Avon or Nen. The castle is very ancient. Has fairs on the third Monday after Old Midsummer, and of July 5. Edward duke of York, in the reign of Henry V. founded and endowed a fine collegiate church here, in the windows of which are some fine painted glass, and here he was interred. King Richard III. was born in this castle.

FOUGERES, a town of Brittany in France. It lies on the Cuesnon, 41 miles S. E. of St. Malo. Lat. 48, 27, N. Long. 1, 18, E.

FOULA, an island of the Orkneys, in the N. of Scotland, three miles long, and six leagues W. of that called the Mainland of the Orcaes.

FOULIES, FOLIES, or PHOLIES, a people of Africa, in the countries lying about the rivers Senegal and Gambia. They are much like the Arabs, but not so white, nor yet so black as the Negroes. They are Mahometans, and understand Arabic. They live in hords, or clans, build towns, and are not subject to the kings of the country which they inhabit; if they are ill-treated by one nation they will remove to another. They have chiefs of their own, under whom they live quietly. They cultivate the ground, and have plantations of tobacco and cotton about their towns, and beyond these are corn fields, which are sown with Indian corn, rice, and two sorts of Guinea corn. They have also potatoes and yams, besides a sort of pulse, between a kidney-bean and a pea.

They are an industrious and frugal people, and are very hospitable to those that visit them. They are very quiet and mild, but yet so courageous, that the Negroes dare not attack them. They breed great numbers of cattle, and kill many lions, tigers, and other wild beasts. They also hunt elephants, for the sake of their teeth, and smoke-dry, and eat their flesh. They are dressed in white cotton garments, and are always neat and clean, especially the women, who keep their houses very sweet. These are placed at a distance from each other, for fear of fires, and are small round huts, thatched on the top, and have no windows nor light, but what comes through the doors. Their towns are enclosed with pales, and at some distance from thence, a thick hedge. The space between them is sown with the things above-mentioned.

FOURNESS, in Lancashire, in Loynsdale, a tract between the Kent, Leven, and Dudden-sands, where were numerous furnaces, as appears from the rents and services paid for them. Here are mountains called Fourness-Fells. Here are stately ruins of an old abbey. This tract runs N. parallel with the W. sides of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and on the S. it runs out into the sea as a promontory, to which there is no passage over the dangerous sands above-mentioned, without guides, who are kept here for the purpose, at the expence of the government.

FOULSHAM, a town of Norfolk, with a market on Tuesdays, but no fairs, seated on a common, 12 miles N. W. of Norwich, and 102 N. E. of London. Long. 1, 10, E. Lat. 42, 48, N.

FOWEY, a river in Cornwall, rises in Fowey-moor, not far from Brownwilly, one of the highest mountains in Cornwall. In its course it washes the borough of Lestwithiel, where it passes under a stone bridge of nine arches. Formerly the sea ebbed and flowed above this town, and, according to Camden, brought up vessels of good burthen. At present, however, loaded barges can scarce come within a mile of it. About three miles below, the Fowey, having been increased in its passage face by several small streams, becomes a deep and wide haven. In two miles more, it reaches the town and borough of Fowey, built on its western bank; and a little below, falls into the sea between two old towers built in the reign of Edward IV. This is thought to be the largest body of fresh-water, except the Tamar, in the county of Cornwall.

FOWEY, FAWEY, or FOY, in Cornwall, 240 miles from London, has a commodious haven on the Channel, is a populous place, extending above one mile on the E. side of a river of its own name, has a great share in the fishing-trade, especially pilchards. It rose so much formerly by naval wars and piracies, that in the reign of Edward III. its ships, refusing to strike when required, as they failed by Rye and Winchelsea, were attacked by the ships of those ports, but defeated them; whereupon they bore their arms mixed with the arms of these two cinque-ports, which gave rise to the name of the Gallants of Fowey. And, we learn from Camden, that this town quartered a part of the arms of every one of the cinque-ports with their own, intimating, that they had at times triumphed over them all; and indeed once they were so powerful, that they took several of the French men of war.

In the reign of Edward III. they rescued certain ships of Rye from distress, for which this town was made a member of the cinque-ports. Edward IV. favoured this town so much, that when the French threatened to come up the river and burn it, he caused two towers, the ruins of which are yet visible, to be built at the public charge for its security; but he was afterwards so disgusted with the inhabitants for falling upon the French, after a truce proclaimed with Lewis XI. that he took away all their ships and naval stores, together with a chain drawn across the river between the two forts above-mentioned, which was carried to Dartmouth. It is said they were so insolent, that they cut off the ears of the king's pursuivants, for which some lives were forfeited as well as estates. The corporation consists of a mayor, recorder, eight aldermen, a town-clerk, and two assistants. The Trefryes have long had a mansion here. The market is Saturday, the fairs May-day, and Sept. 10.

Here are a fine old church, a free-school, and an hospital. The toll of the market and fairs, and keyage of the harbour, were vested in the corporation on the payment of a fee-farm rent of about 40s. It does not appear to have sent members to parliament before the 13th of queen Elizabeth. Here is a coinage for the tin, of which a great quantity is dug in the country to the N. and W. of it. The river Foy, or Foath, is very broad and was formerly navigable as high as Leftwithiel.

FOX-ISLANDS. See ARCHIPELAGO NORTHERN.

FOX-RIVER, a large stream of water mentioned by Carver, as taking its rise in the interior parts of N. America, and running into Winnebago Lake, and on the banks of which the Winnebago Indians reside.

FOY, (St.) a town of Agenois and Guyenne, in France, on the river Dordogne. It was strongly fortified by the Reformed, but taken in 1622. It lies 35 miles E. of Bourdeaux. Lat. 44, 49, N. Long. 9, 5, E.

FOYLE, (Lough,) bay of the sea, serving as a road to Londonderry, in the county of the latter name, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is 14 miles long, and seven where broadest. Though not much above a mile at its entrance, and though there are sands near it, yet has a channel broad enough for ships to pass in 14 or 15 fathoms water, and 8 or 10 at the mouth. In the lough are also considerable sands, but generally a broad channel between these of four and five fathoms deep. The headland of this lough is reckoned the most northern land of Ireland, as are at least Emistone, Rufferhull, or Caldyehead, all near one another, which lie a little to the W. Lat. 55, 20, N. Into this bay runs a river of its name, which washes the city of Londonderry.

FRAGA, anciently Flavia Gallica, an old town belonging to the province of Aragon in Spain, on the river Cinca; where is kept a good garrison. It lies 48 miles E. of Saragossa. Lat. 41, 21, N. Long. 0, 5, E.

FRAMLINGHAM, a large well-built market-town of Suffolk, with a spacious antique castle, and high walls with towers, to which the princess Mary (afterwards queen Mary I.) retired, when the lady Jane Grey was her competitor for the crown. In this place is a charity-school founded by Sir Robert Hitcham for 40 poor boys, who have 10l. each to put them out apprentices, with almshouses. Its market is on Saturday, and has two annual fairs, on Whitsun-Monday, and St. Michael's day. It stands on the river Ore, five miles from Debenham, 28 from Bury St. Edmund's, and 88 from London.

FRAMPTON, a village and large parish of Gloucestershire, upon the Severn, from which place the tide in that river runs up for four miles westward, with such great rapidity, that reaching a hill to the left of the forest of Dean, and turning northward, it gathers into a head, like a wier across the river, and carrying every thing before it, till it comes to Newnham's Nob, which turning the torrent so eastward, that N. of Frampton the land between the two parts of the river is but a mile broad. Near Frampton the earl of Berkeley has made a bulwark, in order to force the river by Arts-point into its ancient channel. Frampton consists of one long street, running N. and S. and behind it in the vale is a high bank of earth to defend it from the floods.

At the lower end of the town, namely, on the N. is a ferry over the Severn, a spacious road running westward from the town to the forest, and repaired at his Majesty's expence. Here was the first glass made, it is said in England. An annual fair is kept here, February 14. It lies 10 miles S. from Gloucester, 10 N. W. from Stroud, and 117 from London.

FRANCE, Gallia, in general, a large kingdom of Europe, very advantageously situated in the middle of the temperate zone. It owes its present name of France to the Franks, who came from Germany into Gaul, the latter so called from the Galli or Celtæ, who in the fifth century possessed themselves of this country from the Rhine to the mouth of the Loire. France at present lies between lat. 43, 51, N. The royal academy make it 13 of longitude; namely, from the extremity of Brittany near Ushant, that is, from Conquet, which lies five degrees W. of London, to Strasburg in Alsace, which is about eight degrees E. of London. So that its length from the Pyrenean mountains in the S. to Dunkirk in the N. is eight degrees and a half, or 170 leagues, i. e. 510 miles, reckoning 60 miles to a degree of long. and in breadth, from the uttermost point in Brittany to Strasburg above-mentioned, about 495 miles; only Brittany extends to the W. farther than any other province.

On the N. it is separated from England by the British channel; on the N. E. it confines on the Spanish, now Austrian Netherlands; on the E. it is bounded by Germany, Switzerland, Savoy, and Piemont, in Italy; from the last of which it is separated by the Alps; on the S. it has the Mediterranean sea, and also the Pyrenean mountains, which divide it from Spain; and on the W. it is surrounded by the Western or the Atlantic ocean.

The air is salubrious, and subject neither to great cold nor excessive heat, the degree of both which vary according to the different situation of its provinces. In the S. parts of France, as Dauphiny, Provence, and Languedoc, the winters are generally very sharp, but of short continuance. And the seasons in France are more regular than they are in England. This is a very pleasant country, through which run several fine rivers that render it very fruitful. The principal of these which are also navigable, are the Seine, the Loire, the Garonne, and Rhone, &c. It abounds in corn fruit, wine, oil, cattle, tame and wild fowl, hemp, and flax. The coasts yield abundance of fish and salt sufficient for themselves and their neighbours, principally made at the Isle of Ré, Rochfort, and the coast of Saintonge. Here are likewise mines of lead, iron, and copper, and some of gold and silver; but these last are not worked.

The principal commodities which France exports are wine, brandy, fine and other linen, canvas, paper, salt, wrought silks, druggets, and other stuffs; several wrought goods, as gloves, laces of all kinds, &c. The people are a medley of the posterity of the ancient Gauls, principally of the Romans, Franks or Franconians, Visigoths and Burgundians. Cæsar says of the Gauls, that they were ready witted, but rash and unsteady; which character in general agrees pretty much with the modern French; though with several exceptions, since France has produced learned and industrious men in all arts and sciences, especially in the present age, and even a woman has been found an excellent critic in philology. They abound in compliments, and are very civil, especially to strangers, have a natural freedom in their conversation, which they frequently over-acted, and mixed with levity, if not hypocrisy.

Both the men and women are full of talk. In their dress they are something fantastical, but in generally have an air of gentility. The French, but particularly the Normans, are very much addicted to law-suits. The gentry generally scorn trade, which makes them fond of obtaining offices, and posts of honour or profit under the crown. In war the French have been found furious in attacking, but quick in retreating; which though still in a great measure applicable to them, yet through strict discipline, their soldiers will endure the fatigues of a camp or siege, and behave valiantly in battle, as well as rally and make good retreats.

The religion of the Gauls was Paganism, even to the offering of human sacrifices; but this barbarity they gradually laid aside. Christianity was received very early in the southern parts of France, and St. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, came hither in the middle of the second century. But the Franks being Pagans, it was again suppressed, till Clovis V. being converted by St. Vaast, the first bishop of Rheims, it was restored.

The ancient language of the Gauls was the same with that of our ancient Britons; but being blended with the German and Gothic, as well as the Latin, which its respective invaders brought with them, the last has much the greater share of it.

The present French language is voluble, and very much refined by the royal academy, and the modern French writers; but being thus extremely enervated, by exploding a great many expressive old old words, it is neither very copious nor fit for heroic composition. However, though the French tongue has nothing of signal majesty nor striking manliness in it, it is at present used in most courts in Europe, and the most generally understood, of any modern language in Christendom.

The ancient Galli or Celtæ possessed a very large extent of country, comprehending not only all the present France, but part of Italy also, as far as the river Rubrion, and all that part of Germany and Belgium lying within the Rhine. Hence it was divided into Gallia Cisalpina and Transalpina; the former, with regard to the Romans, on the S. side of the Alps, and the latter on the N. side. Cisalpine Gaul being divided by the river Po into two parts, the one was called Cispedana, and the other Transpedana. Julius Cæsar divides Gaul into three parts, according to the same number of its inhabitants; namely, the Belgi, Galli or Celtæ, and the Aquitani. His successor Augustus divided it into Gallia Narbonensis, Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Belgica. The Notitia Imperii, made in the fourth century, divides it into five great provinces; as Lugdunensis, Belgica, Germania, Viennensis, and Aquitania; and these subdivided into several others.

Some divide Gaul into Togata, Comata, Braccata. Gallia Togata, the same with Cisalpina, so called as wearing the Roman gown: Gallia Comata, the same with Transalpina, as wearing long hair; and Gallia Braccata, afterwards styled Narbonensis, from the breeches worn by its inhabitants.

The emperor Constantine the Great divided Gaul into 17 provinces or governments; six of which were consular, and 11 under certain presidents sent by the emperor, who resided in the capital cities.

The same emperor placed counts in the cities, and dukes in the frontier towns, for the administration of justice; and the office of Præfectus Prætorio, or Lieutenant-general of the empire, he divided among four persons, the one to reside among the Gauls, and under him three vicars, who were dispersed in Britain, France, and Spain. After this the Goths got footing in Gaul; namely, Narbonensis and Aquitaine. And the Burgundians, a populous nation on the Rhine, possessed themselves of all the S. E. parts, and of both Burgundies.

This was the state of Gaul when the Franks or French entered it. Let this much serve as a short sketch of its ancient state.

After Clovis's death, the dominion of the Franks was divided into Oosterick, corruptedly Austria and Austrasia, or the eastern kingdom; and Westerwick or Neustria, that is, the western kingdom. The former comprehended all Old France, and other parts they had conquered; and the latter all the country between the Meuse and Loire.

Now with regard to its more modern state: the number of inhabitants in France is reckoned at 20,000,000. They are extremely devoted to their prince, though he treats them like slaves, and mighty full of themselves, even to a contempt of all other nations. Their manufactures are considerable, and their foreign trade also to Spain, Italy, and Turkey; though that to the West and East Indies seems in the present war with England to be entirely at a stand, as most of their settlements have been greatly harassed in Asia, America, and Africa. The articles of their wine, silk, linen, and lace, sent into Great Britain, are very beneficial to France, as the returns are principally in coin.

France was divided not many ages ago into 12 provinces, with a parliament to each, without whose consent no law or levying of money could pass, till Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, successors to each other in the ministry, made the kings of France absolute; so that the parliaments are at present assembled only to pass such arrears or laws as he pleases to send them: yet in civil and criminal causes these are the last resort, unless the king interposes. These consist of presidents and inferior judges, who purchase their places; whence arises a great revenue to the crown. The parliament of Paris is the most considerable in all France, and to it the King comes to see his own acts recorded. Here the dukes and peers of France sit, besides the ordinary judges; and this court alone takes cognizance of all offences committed by peers, where the king does not issue a special commission for their trial; as also of all matters relating to the crown, exclusively of the other parliaments.

The kingdom of France is divided into 36 governments, over each of which is appointed a king's lieutenant-general, a superintendent, who pretty much resembles the lord-lieutenants in England, but their executive powers are far more extensive. Distributive justice in France is administered by parliaments, chamber of accounts, courts of aid, presidial courts, generalities, elections, and other courts. The parliaments were in number 15, those of Paris, Toulouse, Rouen, Grenoble, Bourdeaux, Dijon, Aix, Remes, Pau, Mets, Besançon, Douay, Perpignan, Colmar, and Arras. Several of these parliaments, however, are now united into one. The parliament of Paris is the chief, and takes the lead in all national business. It is divided into ten chambers. The grand chamber is appropriated chiefly for the trial of peers.

The Tournelle Civile judges in all matters of property above the value of 1000 livres. The Tournelle Criminelle receives and decides appeals from inferior courts in criminal cases. Besides these three capital chambers, there are five of requests, for receiving the depositions of witnesses, and determining causes, pretty much in the same manner as our bills and answers in chancery and the exchequer.

On the 22d of February 1771, after a long, but ineffectual, struggle with his parliament, the French king issued an edict to the following effect: That as the jurisdiction of the parliament of Paris was too extensive, reaching from Lyons, in the south of France, to Arras, in French Flanders, northward; which great distance occasioned much expence to his subjects, who might be obliged to come to Paris for the prosecution of their law affairs, his majesty had thought fit to branch the parliament of Paris into six different parliaments.

The present parliament of France has no analogy with that of Great Britain. It was originally instituted to serve as a kind of law assistant to the assembly of the states, which was composed of the great peers and landholders of the kingdom, and ever since it continued to be a law, and at last a money court; and the members have had the courage of late to claim a kind of negative power to the royal edicts, which they pretend can be of no validity till registered by them.

Over each of the governments the king appoints a general officer, called an intendant, who controuls the governor and other ministers of justice, and presides over the receivers of his generality. These generalities are said together to contain 38,502 parishes; these again 1,585,112 families liable to pay the taille or land-tax.

Nothing certain can be said concerning the revenues of a prince who can command the purses of all his subjects. In 1716, the whole specie of France in gold and silver was computed to be about 17,000,000 sterling; and though the crown was then doubly a bankrupt, being in debt about 100,000,000 sterling, or 2000,000,000 of livres, yet, by laying hold of almost all the current money in the kingdom, and by arbitrarily raising or lowering the value of coins, in four years time the duke regent of France published a general state of the public debts, by which it appeared that the king scarcely owed 340,000,000 of livres. This being done by a national robbery, we can form no idea but that of despotism, of the means by which so great a deduction was effected. The French court has not since that time blushed to own, to wit, towards the conclusion of the late war, and also in 1769, that their king was a bankrupt; and his ministers have pursued measures pretty much similar to those practised by the regent to recruit the royal finances.

Some writers say that the annual revenues of France, ordinary and extraordinary, by the account of their own financiers (including Lorrain) do not amount to clear 6,000,000 sterling, which is not equal to the natural revenue of England alone. Though I am apt to think that this calculation of the French revenues is rather too low, and that they may be fixed at seven millions; yet we are not to form our ideas of them from the great armaments, garrisons, and fortifications maintained by the French king, because their expence is inconsiderable to him, compared to what they would be to the king of Great Britain; and the like observation holds good in all the other departments of public expence in both kingdoms. The French themselves, it is true, magnify the revenues of their crown sometimes to 12,000,000 sterling, or above; but their natural vanity gives them no right to any credit on such a head; and though it is not at all impossible that the French king, in time of war, may raise such a sum upon his subjects, and discharge it by repaying them with one third of the debt, yet that is not to be accounted as a stated national revenue, and tends only to prove the misery of the subject, and the injustice of the crown.

In France taxes are raised by the taille, or land-tax. The taillon, which the nobility are obliged to pay as well as the commons, is only another land-tax; by aids, which we call customs on merchandize; by gabels, which is a tax upon salt; by a capitation or poll-tax, by the tenth of estates and employments, by a sale of all offices of justice, by confiscation and forfeitures, and by a tenth or free gift of the clergy, exclusive of the annual sum of 12,000,000 of livres, which that body has of late advanced to the king.

There is no nation in Europe where the art of war, particularly that part of it relating to gunnery and fortification, is better understood than in France. Besides other methods for cultivating it, there is a royal military academy established purposely for training up 500 young gentlemen at a time, in the several branches of this great art. In time of peace the crown of France maintains about 200,000 men, but, as I have already hinted, at a very small expence, the pay of the common men being little more than two-pence half-penny per day. In the time of war 400,000 have been brought into the field; but those that are raised from the militia are very indifferent troops. In the reign of Lewis XIV. the French had at one time time 100 ships of the line, which was almost equal to the marine force of all Europe besides.

The French nobility are of four kinds; first the princes of the blood; secondly, dukes and counts, peers of France; thirdly, the ordinary nobility; fourthly, the nobility lately made, or those made in the present reign. The first prince of the blood is the person who stands next to the crown after the king's sons. The knights of the Holy Ghost are ranked among the higher nobility, as are the governors and lieutenants-general of provinces.

In France there are three orders; first, that of St. Michael, instituted in 1469, and though originally composed only of 36 knights, was afterwards enlarged to a hundred. A person must be a knight of this order before he can enter into that of (secondly) the Holy Ghost, which was founded in 1578, by Henry III. and is composed of a hundred persons, exclusive of the sovereign, and conferred only on princes of the blood, and persons of the highest rank. Thirdly, the order of St. Lewis, which was instituted in the year 1693 by Lewis XIV. merely for military merit, and is worn by almost every officer, and even subalterns.

The religion of this country publicly tolerated (since the revocation of the edict of Nantz, for the Calvinists or Reformed in 1685) is the Roman Catholic: but they seem less devoted to the pope than any other nation of that communion. Their princes have frequently quarrelled with the head of the church, for assuming too much power; particularly Lewis XIV.

The French would never receive the council of Trent, at least with regard to the discipline of the church: and the clergy, by their declaration of 1682, have asserted the liberty of the Gallican church, the authority of general councils, and that the pope's judgement is not irreformable, meaning irreverfible, if not infallible, unless the consent of the church go along with it; and they expressly condemn his pretended power over princes in temporal matters, to depose them directly or indirectly, or to absolve the subjects of their allegiance; neither have they yet admitted the inquisition; though it must be owned, that the nation in general have adhered to the church of Rome, and all its other errors and superstitions besides.

Upon the repeal of the above-mentioned edict by Lewis XIV. which toleration the Protestants had sought several years to obtain, and was first granted them by his grandfather, Henry IV. or Le Grand, a cruel persecution ensued, by which above 100,000 Reformed were forced to quit France: so that the Protestant refugees, setting up manufactories wherever they came, particularly in England and Holland; by which means the demand for French merchandise has since been very considerably diminished.

The crown of France is hereditary only in the male line, to the exclusion of females by the Salique law. And in the succession of their royal families, there have been three upon the throne, namely, the Merovingian, Carolinian, and Capetian branches, entirely distinct, who were no other than successive usurpers upon one another.

The present reigning family is that of Bourbon, which began in Henry of Navarre, surnamed Henry the Great, through a scene of bloodshed, and the final crushing of the league. He was a Protestant when he ascended the throne; but publicly renounced his religion, and professed the Roman Catholic: but the Jesuits suspecting his sincerity, are said to have hired Ravillac, by whom he was stabbed not long after.

The stile of the eldest son of France is always Dauphine.

The new acquisitions and conquests of France within something more than a century ago, have been Alsace, very lately Lorrain and Bar, both on the side of Germany; those of Artois, Cambray, part of Flanders, Hainault, and Luxemburg, on the side of the Austrian Netherlands; Franche Comté and Rouffilon, a part of Catalonia, in Spain.

Its highest mountains are the Pyrannees, the Alps, those of Sevens, Auvergne, &c.

The principal islands belonging to France are in the Mediterranean, namely, the Hieres on the coast of Provence, Lerimes on the same coast; secondly, those on the Atlantic ocean are Oleron, on the coast of Annis and Saintonge, Ré on the same coast, Noirmontier on the coast of Poitou, Belleisle on the coast of Brittany, Ouisant or Ushant on the coast of Brittany, opposite to Conquete.

The most considerable ports of France are in the Atlantic ocean, as Calais, Ambleteuse, St. Valory, Dieppe, Havre-de-Grace, St. Malo, Brest, La Rochelle, Rochford, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne. Also in the Mediterranean sea are Marseilles and Toulon.

In the whole kingdom there are 17 archbishops, 113 bishops, 770 abbeys for men, 317 abbeys and priories for women, besides a great number of lesser convents, and 250 commanderies of the order of Malta; but many of the abbeys and nunneries have been lately suppressed, and the revenues seized by the king. The ecclesiastics of all sorts are computed at near 200,000, and the revenues at about 6,000,000 sterling. The king nominates all archbishops, bishops, and priors, and can tax the clergy without a papal licence or mandate; accordingly, not many years since, he demanded the 20th penny of the clergy, and, to ascertain that, required them to deliver in an inventory of their estates and incomes; to avoid which, they voluntarily made an offer of the annual sum of 12,000,000 of livres, over and above the usual free gift, which they pay every five years.

The archbishop of Lyons is count and primate of France. The archbishop of Sens is primate of France and Germany. The archbishop of Paris is duke and peer of the realm; and the archbishop of Rheims is duke and peer, and legate of the holy see.

Universities and public colleges, as well as all literary institutions, have received an irreparable loss by the expulsion of the Jesuits, who made the languages, arts, and sciences, their particular study, and taught them all over France. It is not within my plan to describe the different governments and constitutions of every university or public college in France; but they are in number 26, as follow; Aix, Angers, Arles, Avignon, Besançon, Bourdeaux, Bourges, Caen, Dol, Douay, Fleche, Montauban, Montpellier, Nantes, Orange, Orleans, Paris, Perpignan, Poitiers, Point Moufon, Richlieu, Rheims, Soissons, Strasbourg, Thoulouse, and Valence.

There are eight academies in Paris, namely, three literary ones; that called the French Academy, that of Inscriptions, and that of the Sciences; one of Painting and Sculpture, one of Architecture, and three for riding the Great Horse and other Military Exercises.

Few countries, if we except Italy, can boast of more valuable remains of antiquity than France. Some of the French antiquities belong to the time of the Celts, and consequently, compared to them, those of Rome are modern. Father Mabillon has given us a most curious account of the sepulchres of their kings, which have been discovered so far back as Pharamond; and some of them when broke open were found to contain ornaments and jewels of value. At Rheims, and other parts of France, are to be seen triumphal arches; but the most entire is at Orange, erected on account of the victory obtained over the Cimbri and Teutones by Caius Marius and Lactantius Catulus. After Gaul was reduced to a Roman province, the Romans took vast delight in adorning it with magnificent edifices, both civil and sacred, some of which are more entire than any to be met with in Italy itself. The ruins of an amphitheatre are to be found at Chalons, and likewise at Vienne. Nîmes, however, exhibits the most valuable remains of ancient architecture of any place in France. The famous Pont du Garde was raised in the Augustan age by the Roman colony of Nîmes, to convey a stream of water between two mountains, for the use of that city, and is as fresh at this day as Westminster bridge: it consists of three bridges, or-tites of arches one above another; the height is 174 feet, and the length extends at 723. The moderns are indebted for this, and many other stupendous aqueducts, to the ignorance of the ancients, that all streams will rise as high as their heads. Many other ruins of antiquity are found at Nîmes, but the chief is the temple of Diana, whose vestiges are still remaining. The amphitheatre called Les Arenes, which is thought to be the finest and most intire of the kind of any in Europe; above all, the house erected by the emperor Adrian, called the Maison Carrée. The architecture and sculpture of this building is so exquisitely beautiful, that it enchants even the most ignorant, and is still entire, being very little affected either by the ravages of time, or the havock of war. At Paris may be seen the remains of the palace of Thermæ, which was built by the emperor Julian, furnished the Apostate, about the year 356, after the same model as the baths of Dioclesian. The remains of this ancient edifice are many arches, and within them a large saloon. It is fabricated of a kind of mastic, the composition of which is not now known, intermixed with small square pieces of free-stone and bricks.

At Arles in Provence is to be seen an obelisk of oriental granite, which is 52 feet high, and seven feet diameter at the base, and all of one stone. Roman temples are frequent in France. At Lyons are the remains of that built by the 60 nations in Gaul, in honour of Augustus and the Romans. The most particular are in Burgundy and Guinene, and other places besides the neighbourhood of Nîmes, containing magnificent ruins of aqueducts. The passage cut through the middle of a rock near Briançon in Dauphiny, is thought to be a Roman work, if not of greater antiquity. The round buckler of massy silver, taken out of the Rhone in 1665, being 20 inches in diameter, and weighing 21 pounds, containing the story of Scipio's continence, is thought to be coeval with that great general. Near Poitiers is a stone of a prodigious size, supported by four pillars; but the cause of its erection is not known. It would be endless to recount the different monuments of antiquity to be found in France, particularly in the cabinets of the curious.

Several remarkable springs and mountains may be considered as natural curiosities. Some of the modern work of art, particularly the canals, and some some subterraneous passages and holes, especially at St. Aubin in Brittany and Niont in Dauphiny, are really stupendous.

FRANCHE COMTE, or county of Burgundy, one of the governments of France. It is bounded on the N. by Lorrain, on the N. E. by the county of Mont Belliard, on the E. by Mount Jura, a ridge of mountains extending from the Rhine near Basil to the Rhone. Four leagues below Geneva, this ridge parts Franche Comté from Switzerland. On the S. it confines on Bresse and Bugey, to the W. on the county of Auxonne, and the Western Chalonnois, which are parts of Burgundy; and on the N. W. it has Champagne. Its extent from N. to S. is about 35 French leagues, and from E. to W. about 25. Franche Comté contains the greatest part of the territories of the ancient Segunni. It came in process of time to the duke of Burgundy, then to the emperor Maximilian; and continued in the possession of the house of Austria till Lewis XIV. of France treacherously seized it in 1668; but restored it the following year. He seized it again in 1674, and had it afterwards confirmed to him by the treaties of Nimègue and Ryswick.

Its principal rivers are the Saone, Lognon, Doux, Louve, and Daine, abounding with excellent fish; besides several less considerable streams.

In this country are mines of copper, lead, iron, and some of silver, with mineral waters, and quarries of all sorts of marble. It is partly level and partly hilly, the former very fruitful in grain, wine, &c. and the latter feeding great numbers of cattle and horses. Along the rivers Saone, Doux, and Lognon are about 30 forges for iron-works, bombs, &c. and at Befançon and Pontalier are several armourers, who work excellently well. Many thousand colts of this country are bought by the jockies of the neighbouring provinces of France, to the very great profit of the inhabitants. The climate is not proper for sheep; and they make about 1,200,000 pounds weight of saltpetre annually, and could make more were it required. The capital is Befançon.

FRANCIS, (St.) at the western extremity of Lac de St. Pierre, in Canada, is a vast number of isles of all dimensions, called De Richlieu. In turning to the left, as one comes from Quebec, are particularly six islands, which border a deep neck of land, into which a fine river discharges itself, whose source is in the neighbourhood of New York. The isles, the river, and the whole country watered by it, all go by the name of St. Francis. Each of the islands is upwards of a large quarter of a league in length, but of unequal breadth; but the greatest part of those called De Richlieu are smaller.

In the river of St. Francis, and at its mouth, they catch excellent fish. In winter they make holes in the ice, through which passing nets five or six fathoms in length, they seldom draw them empty. The fish which they commonly take are, barbel, jilt-fish, achigans, masquinongez, a species of pike with a head larger than that of ours, and a mouth under a crooked snout. The soil of St. Francis, if we may judge of it by the trees produced on it, and the little which has hitherto been cultivated, is very good; yet the inhabitants are poor.

FRANCIS, (St.) a river of Brasil, on its E. coast, having its course mostly E. from 46 to 35. E. long. parts Parnambuco and All-saints Bay. In some places it is so broad that a six-pounder can scarcely reach over it; and its depth is 8, 12, and sometimes 15 yards: but it admits no ship of burden, its entrance being choaked up with sand; though up the river, Nieuhoff tells us, for near 40 leagues, is of good depth and pretty broad. The Portuguese relate, that about 50 leagues from sea, it has impassable cataraets. This river, about mid-way between its mouth and its source, buries itself for several leagues under ground, and after its emerging, forms some considerable islands.

FRANKEMONT, a town of the bishopric of Liege in Germany. It lies 15 leagues S. E. of Liege city. Lat. 50, 27, N. Long. 5, 52, E.

FRANCOIS, (Cape) the capital of the French division of the island of St. Domingo, in the West Indies, is situated on a cape on the N. side of the island, at the edge of a large plain 20 leagues long; and on an average, four broad, between the sea and the mountains. There are few lands better watered, but there is not a river that will admit of a sloop above three miles. This space is cut through by straight roads, 40 feet broad, constantly lined with hedges of lemon-trees, intermixed with long avenues of lofty trees, which lead to plantations, producing a greater quantity of sugar than any country in the world. The town, which is situated in the most unhealthy place of this extensive and beautiful plain, consists of 29 straight, narrow, and dirty streets, divided into 226 allotments, which comprehend 810 houses. The governor's house, the barracks, and the king's magazine, are the only public buildings which attract the notice of the curious; but those that deserve to be considered by the humane, are two hospitals, called the houses of Providence, founded for the support of those Europeans who come hither without money or merchandise.

The harbour is only a bay, open to the N. and E. winds, before which is a considerable extent of sand-banks, reefs, and rocks, by which it is sheltered from the sea. What is called the port is.

is in the bottom of the bay, about three quarters of a mile from the town: the W. point going in, which is high and steep, is called Point Picolet.

The town is situated on the W. side, about two miles from Point Picolet, close to the water, and near the mountains. Lat. 19, 45, N. Long. 72, 13, W.

FRANCOLINO, once a strong place of the Ferrarese, in the Ecclesiastical State, and Middle Division of Italy, upon the Po, now an ill-peopled straggling village, 12 miles N. E. of the city of Ferrara. Lat. 45, 32, N. Long. 12, 21, E.

FRANCONIA, one of the circles of the empire, and in the heart of Germany. The Germans call it Frankenland, and anciently Franconia Orientalis. It is bounded on the N. by Thuringia, Saxony, and Hesse; on the S. by Suabia; on the E. by the palatinate of Bavaria; and on the W. by that of the Rhine, part of Hesse, and the Wetteraw. Its extent from E. to N. is about 130 miles, and from N. to S. 135; but is both ways much indented. In some parts the soil is mountainous and barren, but in others very fruitful in corn, wine, &c. Here are several forests and parks, abounding with game, and rivers with store of fish. It is surrounded with woods and hills; the latter particularly along the Maine and Tauber are covered with vines, yielding as rich grapes as any on the Rhine. From this country came principally these Franks and Germans, who in the fifth century conquered France, which kingdom took its name from thence. The capital is Nuremberg.

Several princes have the sovereignty or territorial jurisdiction of this circle. Hence in it are Papists, Calvinists, and Jews; but Lutheranism is the most prevalent religion. It is divided into four principalities, subject to the bishops of Bamberg, Wurtzburg, Aichstat, and the grand master of the Teutonic order; also to the Burgraves of Nuremberg, the Margraves of Brandenburg-Cullenbach, and Brandenburg-Anspach. Besides these are some other smaller lordships. The bishop of Bamberg has the pre-eminence; but the bishop of Wurtzburg is the most powerful. Its principal rivers are the Maine, Rednitz, Pegnitz, Altamult, Saal, and Tauber, which all rise in this country.

FRANFIELD, a village in Suffex, with one fair, on June 24.

FRANKENBERG, on the river Eder, also called Frankenaw, and Francorum Mons, a large town in the westernmost bounds of Upper Hesse, in Germany, towards Westphalia. It lies 15 miles S. E. of Waldeck, and six E. of Sachsenberg.

FRANKENDAL, a town of the palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany, a mile W. of the Rhine, and a little above the junction of the rivulet Frankendalerbach with it. This place has been frequently taken; but in the years 1688 and 1689, it was burnt with several other towns by the French, who soon after abandoned them. The emperor Charles V. caused a conference to be held here with the Anabaptists at his own expence, which conference was printed. It lies 12 miles S. of Worms, and 18 miles N. W. of Heidelberg. Lat. 29, 47, N. Long 8, 22, E.

FRANKENSTEIN, a town of Zweybruggen, or Deux-Ponts, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany. It lies 14 miles N. W. of Landau. Lat. 49, 32, N. Long. 7, 41, E.

FRANKER, or FRANEKER, a town of West Friesland, one of the Seven United Provinces. It has a good rampart and ditch, with a castle on the W. side commanding the town. Two canals run through the town, that from Leeuwarden being navigable, with high banks. Here is an university, with professors for all the faculties. The students are pretty numerous, being among other privileges, exempted from taxes on wine and beer. Here is a good grammar-school and orphan-hospital. St. Martin's church is a fine building, with a handsome steeple. It lies 12 miles W. of Leeuwarden. Lat. 53, 21, N. Long. 5, 38, E.

FRANKFORT, (upon the Maine,) the principal of the imperial and free cities of the Wetteraw, and its capital, on the confines of Hesse and Franconia, in Germany. It is a populous, rich city one of the Hanse towns, and the seat of the imperial diet being governed by its own magistrates. It is divided by the river into two parts; that on the S. side, is called Saxenhausen, being joined by a stone bridge of 14 arches. It is well fortified, and has a great trade by the Maine and Rhine, and several other streams which fall into them, by that means bringing abundance of corn and wine from the Palatinate and Franconia.

Here are two annual fairs lasting three weeks, the one 15 days before Easter, and the other on the 15th of September, with merchandise and every kind of commodity, particularly books from all parts of Europe. Here are also three marts every year. The streets are mostly large. On the N. side of the city is a spacious horse fair, where vast numbers are bought, particularly by the French king. The Jews are the chief jockies. The city is round without any suburbs. Among its public structures, St. Bartholemew's cathedral is a venerable pile, and the place where the emperor is crowned; but chosen by the ecclesiastical and temporal electors, in the town-house. In the city are several noble fountains, mineral springs, and baths. The magistrates and most of the inhabitants are Lutherans, who have five churches. The Papists are are allowed to worship in the cathedral, but must make no processions. The Calvinists have no churches within the city, but two about a league off, one for the German, and another for the French refugees. These have the chief trade in banking and merchandise.

Its territory, lying on both sides of the Maine, extends for 11 miles from S. to N. and 14 from E. to W. mostly covered with woods and vineyards. The Jews here have a synagogue, and particular quarter in which they are shut up all night, and are obliged, by way of distinction, to wear a bit of yellow cloth. The famous Golden Bull, regulating the manner of electing an emperor, is kept in the town-house of Frankfort. A council was held here in 794, at which 300 bishops assisted, against the Nestorian heresy. Frankfort lies 17 miles W. of Hanau, and 21 E. of Mentz. Lat. 50, 16, N. Long. 7, 36, E.

FRANKFORT, (upon the Oder,) a large and populous city of Brandenburg, and Upper Saxony, in Germany. Over the river, which divides it into two parts, is a large wooden bridge. The streets are wide, the houses well-built, and the market-place spacious. It has a considerable trade principally in linen and fells. It has a communication with the Baltic by means of the Oder, and with the Spree and Havel by canals. Here is a famous Calvinist university, which has bred many learned men.

In 1631 the Swedes took it by storm, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, in revenge of 2000 Swedes, inhumanly put to death by count Tilly, in the city of Brandenburg. It belongs to the king of Prussia, and lies 40 miles E. of Berlin, the road being through a flat sandy country. Lat. 52, 34, N. Long. 14, 58, E.

FRANCKFORT, a town of Philadelphia county, Pennsylvania, well-built, and as large as Bristol town, in Buckingham county. The inhabitants were at first Swedes and Dutch, who had dwelt in several places of Pennsylvania. The former settled themselves principally on the creeks near the freshes, and the latter planted near Oxford, upon the bay. At Franckfort is a Church-of-England-congregation, and in the town are about 80 families. It is about four miles E. of Philadelphia, on a branch of the Delaware river.

FRANKS-TOWN, in Cumberland-county, Pennsylvania, situated among the mountains at the N. W. extremity of the province, 22 miles S. W. of Huntingdon, on the same river which runs into the Susquehannah.

FRANSTADT, or FRAUSTADT, a town of Silesia, 31 miles N. E. of Glogau, and subject to the king of Prussia. Lat. 51, 39, N. Long. 16, 52, E.

VOL. I.—No. 46.

FRASERSBURG, so called from the surname of lord Saltown, is reckoned the principal town in the district of Buchan in Bamfshire, in Scotland, with an excellent new pier, and bulwark of free-stone, built by the aforesaid baron Saltown, on the E. coast of the Murray frith, so as to be as safe and commodious a harbour as any on that side; and 30 ships may securely winter here at a time. The water in it at full sea is 18 or 20 feet. This is a pretty neat town, and in a very plentiful corn and fish country. It lies 15 miles from Bamf.

FRAUBRUNNEN, the capital of a bailiwick, in that called the German country, or Old Canton of Berne, in Switzerland. It is remarkable for a column erected here by the Canton of Berne, with two inscriptions; the one in Latin verse, and the other in German, commemorating the defeat of Ingleram of Guines, a Frenchman, though lord Coucy of England, by the Canton of Berne, in 1375.

FRAUENBURG, where stands the cathedral of the bishop of Wermeland, a palatinate in Prussia, on the Frisch-haff, where it receives the river Schon; it has a good harbour, and lies 10 miles N. E. of Elbing and Pilau.

FRAUENFELDT, the capital of the Thourgau, a subdivision of the county of Baden, in Switzerland, upon the river Murg, with two churches for the Romish and Reformed religion. At one end is the bailiff's castle upon a rock. It lies 11 miles W. of Constance.

FRAUENSTADT, or FRAUSTADT, a town of Poland, on the confines of Silesia, where the Swedes under general Reinschild, beat the Saxons in 1706; by which advantage Charles XII. had Saxony, Poland, and Lithuania, left open to him. It lies 10 miles S. W. of Lissa.

FREDENBURG, or FREUDENBURG, a town of Westphalia, in Germany, 48 miles W. of the city of Cassel. Lat. 51, 14, N. Long. 8, 15, E.

FREDERICA, so called from Frederick, late prince of Wales, a town of Georgia; situated in the middle of St. Simon's island, near the coast. Round the place are good fortifications, particularly a regular fortress, strengthened by four bastions and a spur-work, towards the river, mounted with several pieces of cannon. Here is a magistracy at Savannah, supported at the expence of trustees for the colony of Georgia.

In 1742, the Spaniards having invaded St. Simon, took the fort of that name, but upon marching to besiege Frederica, were repulsed, and forced to quit the enterprize. This island is 13 miles long, and three or four broad, 20 leagues N. of St. Augustine. The fort of St. Simon is seven miles from the town. Besides this are several small islands in the mouth of the river, fortified. Lat. 31, 12. Long. 81, 42.

FREDE-

F R

FREDERICK'S-TOWN, or WINCHESTER, an inland town in Frederick's-county, Virginia, near the head of Opeckon-creek, which runs into the Patowmack river.

FREDERICKSBURG, a town in Spotsylvania, Virginia, five miles S. of Falmouth, 107 N. of Williamsburg, on the S. bank of Rappahannock river. It is 26 miles S. E. to Port-Royal, 52 S. E. to Hobb's-Hole, 61 to Belhaven, 84 N. W. to Winchester.

FREDERICSBURG, a fort of Guinea Proper, in Africa. It formerly belonged to the Brandenburgians, now to the Dutch, having after a good deal of blood driven one John Conny out of it; the former having sold it. Lat. 15, 16, N. Long. 2, 12, W.

FREDERICSHALL, or FRIDERICSHALL, a town of Aggerhuus in Norway, on the Categate, and mouth of the river Glammen, by the convenience of which here is a pretty good trade. It is very well fortified, and reckoned the key of the kingdom. Before it Charles XII. of Sweden having fat down in 1718, was killed as he was viewing the trenches. It has been frequently burnt, but was totally destroyed by an accidental fire in 1763, except a magazine. It lies 34 miles N. of Fredericstادت. Lat. 59, 32, N. Long. 11, 31, E.

FREDERICSHAMN, or WEKELAX, a town belonging to Russia, situated on the gulph of Finland, and government of Wiburg. It was formerly called Wakelax, but Elizabeth, when she took possession of this district in 1710, named this town Fredericshamn. The plan of it is said to be one of the most elegant in the world, and realizes in miniature that attributed to Sir Christopher Wren, which he designed for London, after the great fire in 1666. All the streets go off like a radii from the center, in which is a handsome town-house, but it still appears unpeopled, and the country uncultivated.

FREDERICSONDE, a town of Ripen, and the only fortress in all N. Jutland, in Denmark. It stands on the Little Belt or Middlefort-fund in the Baltic, and opposite to Funen. The Swedes took and burnt this place in 1657; so that king Gustavus had a way opened for his army to march over the ice from this place to Funen. It lies 26 miles W. of Odensee. Lat. 55, 26, N. Long. 10, 12, E.

FREDERICSTADT, a regular and well-built town of Sleswick, in Denmark, between the rivers Eider and Treen, not far from the German Ocean. It is surrounded with a ditch, and a row of large trees, every thing being in the Dutch fashion, as a colony from this country were the first inhabitants. Here all religions are tolerated. A canal divides the town into two parts. It lies 36 miles

W. of Sleswick. Lat. 54, 41, N. Long. 9, 5, E.

FREDERICSTADT, a fortified town of Aggerhuus, in Norway, on the Skagerack-bay, and frontiers of Sweden, 64 miles N. of Gottenburg. Lat. 59, 12, N. Long. 11, 31, E.

FREHAL, (Cape,) a head-land, four leagues W. of St. Maloe's on the coast of France, and the British channel. From St. Maloe to Cape Frehal, the course is W. N. W. four leagues, the coast forming several creeks, before which you may anchor if necessary. The cape is a very high and steep land, on which stands a light-house. Within this cape, about a league E. by S. is another, called Point La Latte, beyond which lies the Road of La Frenaye.

FREISACH, a strong and fortified town of Carinthia and Austria in Germany; also surrounded with a ditch, upon the river Matnitz. It confines on Stiria, and has a fortified castle upon a rock. It lies eight miles N. of Gurck, and in the diocese of Saltzburg.

FREISING, FREISINGEN, a city in Bavaria, situated near the confluence of the Mosach and Isar, with the see of a bishop, to whom it is subject, whose revenue, if not over-rated, is said to amount to 20,000l. sterl. and he is a prince of the empire. The living is commonly given to a younger son of Bavaria. The town and bishop's palace are pleasantly situated amidst fruitful fields and parks. In 1632, the Swedes took it. It lies 26 miles N. of Munich. Lat. 48, 41, N. Long. 11, 51, E.

FREJULS, or FREJUS, in Latin, Forum Julii, a city of Provence, in France, on the river Argentz. Here is an amphitheatre almost entire, and an aqueduct near 10 leagues in length, &c. It is the see of a bishop, of which the famous cardinal Fleury was once prelate, and under that title wrote several pieces, but none after he became prime minister of France. At Frejuls the regale has no place. It lies about half a mile from the Mediterranean, and has a small harbour at the mouth of the river, 36 miles N. E. of Toulon, and 38 S. W. of Nice. Lat. 42, 51, N. Long. 26, 31, E.

FRENCH-ISLANDS, or FLAT-KEYS, in the Windward-Passage, West-Indies; these Keys, hitherto but little known, have been said to be three, but what probably gave rise to that, was a rock which appeared out of water as high as a boat. It is about half a mile to the N. E. of the largest island, among the reefs and banks which run from the one to the other.

This island is no more than three miles N. and S. and half as much E. and W. the E. and the N. sides are surrounded by reefs which break. The anchorage is about three quarters of a mile from from the S. point, near which is a landing-place; and by digging two or three feet in the sand you will get good fresh water. Some English people, who were wrecked here, had made a pond, which dried, upon the Eagle filling four casks out of it, but in a quarter of an hour it was as full as ever.

It is very surprising that about 10 paces from it there is a salt-water pond. This island is low and almost even, though when you are at a distance, there appear some small risings, which diversify a little its appearance; the ground is nothing but sand or rock, with some bushes upon it, fit only for firing. The other island which is the smallest, lies E. and W.

FRESCATI, the Tusculum Novum, in contradistinction to Tusculum Vetus, upon or near the site of which it stands, in the Campagna di Roma, and Middle Division of Italy. It is the see of a bishop, and one of the six usually conferred on the eldest cardinals. Here are fine seats of the modern nobility of Rome, as it was formerly famous for the villas of old Romans, particularly Cicero's Tusculum, where now stands Grotto Fesate. The hill on which it stands is well watered, and has admirable prospects. Addison says, he first saw the sketch of Versailles in the walks and water-works of the palaces here, particularly in those of the Aldobrandini or Belvedere villa. It lies 15 miles E. of Rome. Lat. 42, 12, N. Long. 13, 14, E.

FRESHFORD, a village in Somersetshire, with a fair on Sep. 16.

FRESHWATER-BAY, a bay in the southern Antarctic country, where Dampier anchored. Lat. 3, S. Long. 134, E. from the Lizard-point, that is, 129 deg. 50 min. E. from London. In the same latitude is a bay in the Dutch maps, with Doodslaager river; but their longitudes are not set down, nor are the bearings exactly the same with Dampier's.

FRESICO, (de Espadacinta,) a town of Tra los Montes, in Portugal, standing high at the foot of a mountain, on the river Duero, where that river parts Portugal from Spain. It contains 400 inhabitants, who are principally employed in weaving fine hair-cloths for sieves or scarves.

FRETtingham, a village in Norfolk, with one fair on the first Monday in April, for petty chapmen.

FREUDENBURG. See FREDENBURG.

FREUDENSTADT, a handsome and strong town of Germany, in the Black Forest, built in 1600, to defend the passage in and out of this forest. It is 15 miles S. W. of Tübingen, and 22 S. E. of Stralsburg, Long. 8, 27, E. Lat. 48, 25, N.

F R

FREWEN, a village of Cornwall with two fairs, on Easter-Tuesday, and Sept. 29.

FREYBERG, in the canton of Glarus, in Switzerland, so called as being the property of no particular person; hunting is prohibited in this place on pain of death.

FREYEN, Upper and Lower, or the Free Amps, in Switzerland; bounded on the N. by the county of Baden, on the E. by the counties of Zurich and Zug, S. by the county of Lucerne, and W. by the same and canton of Berne. It is said to have been formerly called the county in Rore, or Rohr, and otherwise the Wagenthal; the people of which were known by the appellation of Rufzthaler, as dwelling in the vale along the Rufz, a river which traverses all the eastern border of this county.

Grain and fruit are produced in great plenty, and the inhabitants who are universally pious, are in religious affairs subject to the bishop of Costance. Anciently they were free, but fell under the sovereignty of the counts of Habsburg, and thus became subject to the house of Austria. The emperor Sigismund, having in 1415, put Frederick, the archduke of Austria under the ban, and commanded the Helvetic Confederates to invade his territories, the troops of Lucerne alone possessed themselves of the greatest part of these Free-amps, and wished to keep them, but this the cantons of Zurich, Zug, Schweiz, Unterwalden, and Glarus, opposed, and claimed their respective shares, as having taken the field at the same time they were conquered; it having been previously agreed that what any one or more canton should conquer from the time the others were in the field should be accounted as conquered by the whole body. This produced a contest which lasted 10 years, when in 1425, Berne and Uri, resigned all share in them, but yet in 1532, were admitted into the co-regency. At the second peace of Arau, in 1712, it was decided, that a boundary line should be drawn from Lunkhofen to Farwangen; thus the Free-amps have ever since continued divided into the Upper and Lower.

The government of the Upper is vested in the cantons of Zurich, Bern, Lucerne, Uri, Schweiz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Glarus; and the Lower, in the cities of Zurich and Berne, Glarus only retaining the seventh part. The civil and criminal affairs are decided by a recorder, in each of these Amps, who are appointed by the cantons. The Upper Free-amps, contains four Amps, and the Lower, nine, in which are several castles, abbeys, villages, &c.

FREYSTADT, a well-built, but not very strong town of Austria, the capital of a district called called Markland. It is famous for a palatable beer, exported into the neighbouring countries, and for an annual fair kept for a fortnight, beginning on St. Paul's day, and much resorted to. It confines on Bohemia, 22 miles N. of Ens, and lying on the N. side of the Danube.

FREYSTADT, a town in the principality of Glogau, belonging to Silesia in Germany. North-west of this place, on the river Oeles, are iron-mines. It was burnt down by an accidental fire, except five houses, on May 6, 1764. It is a great thoroughfare from Cracow to Vienna, and lies 17 miles E. of Troppeau. Lat. 50, 21, N. Long. 17, 46, E.

FREYSTADT, a large town of Upper Hungary, upon the river Waag, with a castle and good baths. It has suffered much from the incursions of the Turks. Freystadt lies four miles N. E. of Leopoldstadt.

FRIAS, a considerable town of Spain, in Old Castile, seated on a mountain near the river Ebro, 25 miles N. W. of Burgos. Long. 3, 27, W. Lat. 42, 50, N.

FRIBURG, or FREYBURG, the capital of the Brisgaw, in Suabia, in Germany, on the river Threisem, abounding with fish, and E. side of the Rhine, into which the former runs. It is a large and regularly-fortified city, with a row of works carried up a steep hill on the E. which contributes greatly to its strength. Here are several churches, and 14 religious foundations, in which was a college of Jesuits. Here are famous lapidaries. Its great church has a lofty tower of free-stone, finely carved. In Friburg is an university, where divinity and philosophy are taught, also law and physic by secular professors. It has besides a very fair college, called the College of Wisdom, in which all the faculties are taught. The Swedes took it thrice, as did the French. The last time was in 1744; but they restored it to the house of Austria, to whom it is still subject. It lies 30 miles S. of Straßburg, and the same N. of Bafil. Lat. 48, 21, N. Long. 7, 46, E.

FRIBURG, (canton of) in Swisserland: it is almost encompassed by that of Berne, is 16 leagues long and 20 broad; but its dimensions are variously given. This country is partly mountainous, and partly level, including the Uchtland, which lies between the rivers Aar and Saane. It is a republic of the aristocratical kind, and can raise 18,000 men; produces excellent cheese, of which upwards of 100,000 florins value is annually exported to France, in exchange for salt. It has plenty of every thing but wine, with which it is supplied from the Pais de Vaux. The canton is divided into three inner bailiwicks, namely those in the neighbourhood of the city, and 18 outer ones.

Its capital of the same is a fine large town, tolerably fortified. It is called Friburg, in Nuchtland or Uchtland, in contradistinction from that above mentioned, in the Brisgaw. It lies mostly among rocks and precipices, several places of which are accessible only by stairs and ladders; yet has spacious streets, fine structures, particularly the cathedral of St. Nicholas, gilt inside and outside, with a lofty square steeple, terminating in eight pyramids. Here the Jesuits have a handsome convent, college, and church; and here also are four other convents of monks, and as many of nuns, this city and whole canton being Roman Catholic. May 2, and June 22, are great festivals here, on account of two victories obtained on these days over Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy. In the neighbourhood is a great curiosity, called Magdalen's Hermitage. It is cut in a rock, and contains a church and steeple, a vestry, a kitchen, a large hall, two rooms on each side, two pair of stairs, and a cellar. The church is 63 feet long, 36 broad, and 22 high. But the most wonderful thing of all is the steeple, which is 70 feet high above the rock. The chimney of the kitchen is also very surprising, for the passage up it is 90 feet in height. It is almost inconceivable how one man, with his servant, could perform so difficult a work, though they were 25 years about it. Lat. 46, 30, N. Long. 17, 51, E.

FRICENTO, a small episcopal town of the Further Principate and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. Its see is united with Avelino. It lies 47 miles E. of Naples city. Lat. 41, 21, N. Long. 15, 46, E.

FRIDBERG, a town of Germany, in Wetteravia, much more considerable formerly than at present, though an imperial town, and governed by its own magistrates. It is seated on a mountain, 10 miles N. E. of Frankfort, and 12 S. of Gießen. Long. 8, 50, E. Lat. 50, 14, N.

FRIDBERG, the name of two small towns in Silesia, the one in the duchy of Javer, and the other in the duchy of Schweidnitz. The last is remarkable for a battle gained there by the king of Prussia over the Austrians in June 1745.

FRIDBERG, an imperial free town of Bavaria in Germany, upon a hill near the source of the river Acha, and between the Lech and Par. It is subject to its own magistrates. In 1632 the Swedes took and plundered it. The Bavarians abandoned it upon the approach of the duke of Marlborough, who encamped here. It lies eight miles E. of Augsburg. Lat. 48, 41, N. Long. 11, 12, E.

FRIDBERG,

F R

FRIDBERG, or FREYBERG, a large, well-built, and populous town of Ertzegeberg, in Upper Saxony, in Germany, the rivulet Muntzbach running through it. This town owes its increase to the neighbouring mines of all sorts, particularly rich ones of silver, which are said to bring the elector a clear annual profit of 130,000*l.* sterling. In 1632 the emperor took it, at which time the elector gave 80,000 rixdollars to save unrisht the family monuments in St. Peter's church, the German princes then being usually buried in their robes, jewels, &c. The streets here are broad, and have handsome public structures. It lies 10 miles S. W. of Dresden. Lat. 50, 51, N. Long. 12, 31, E.

FRIDBURG, a town of Thuringia, in Upper Saxony, in Germany, upon the river Unstruck. It lies 28 miles W. of Leipzig. Lat. 51, 26, N. Long. 11, 48, E.

FRID-LAND, a town of Bohemia, in Germany, and on the confines of Lusatia, in Saxony. It lies 56 miles E. of Dresden, and is subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 50, 49, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

FRIDING, a town of Germany, in Suabia, belonging to the house of Austria, seated on the river Danube, eight miles S. E. of Tübingen, and 30 N. of Constance. Long. 9, 1, E. Lat. 47, 50, N.

FRIDLINGEN, a town of Suabia, in Germany. It lies five miles E. of the Rhine, and six N. of Basil, where, in the year 1702, was fought a sharp, but doubtful, battle between the Imperialists and French. Lat. 47, 29, N. Long. 7, 36, E.

FRIEDBURG, a sovereign free city of Hesse, in Germany, subject to its own magistrates. It lies 18 miles N. of Frankfurt. Lat. 50, 31, N. Long. 8, 36, E.

FRIENDLY ISLES, discovered in the South sea, and visited by captain Cook in 1775 and 1777, situated in lat. 21, S. and long. 185, E. among which are Amsterdam Isle, Rotterdam Isle, Pylstart, Calefoy, &c. all of which see under their proper articles.

FRIESLAND, (North,) in Dutch Vriesland, and in Latin F. sia, one of the Seven United Provinces of Holland, bounded on the E. by the river Lawers, which parts it from Groningen; on the S. by Overissel, on the W. it has the Zuyder-zee, and on the N. the German or North sea. Its greatest extent from N. to S. is 37 miles, and from E. to W. 32. This is part of the country possessed by the ancient Fris, which was governed in the form of a republic. The air here is better than could be expected from its low situation, though in winter the fields are overflown. In many places it yields good pasture, and some arable land, especially Oostergow. Westergow is more fenny, but abounds in fish and fowl. They have no wood; instead of which their fuel is turf, or a bituminous sort of earth. The inhabitants are of a martial disposition, and not much addicted to trade. The language in some parts of the country comes nearer to the Old English than any other in Europe.

The province is divided into Oostergow, Westergow, and the Seven Wolden or Seven Forests.

FRIESLAND, (East) or Oost-Friesland, otherwise called the Earldom of Embden, properly belongs to Westphalia, and is the N. W. part of Germany, and is now subject to the king of Prussia. It has the German ocean on the N. the Dollart bay and the mouth of the Ems on the W. which parts it from Groningen; the bishopric of Munster on the S. and Oldenburg on the E. This country has its own states, without whose consent the prince can undertake nothing considerable; though they, on the other hand, do many things without his approbation, particularly their erecting a trading company at Embden.

FRIGIDUS, or FRIGIDUM, a river of old so called, and which Sanfon and others take to be the river Vipao or Wibach in the county of Goritz, in Carniola. It is famous in Roman history for the decisive victory, A. D. 394, gained by the emperor Theodosius over the usurper Eugenius, who on the death of Valentinian had been proclaimed emperor in Gaul. Theodosius, to preserve his Romans, ordered his auxiliaries to engage the enemy first; which they did to their loss of above 10,000 men. And Eugenius, concluding he had completely won the day, gave his men leave to retire to their tents and refresh themselves, that they might be better able to pursue his enemy next morning. But by break of day Theodosius in person led his army against the unexpected army of Eugenius, and put numbers to the sword, obliging the rest to a precipitate and disorderly flight.

FRINWALT, or FRIDLAND, a town of Brandenburg, and Upper Saxony, in Germany, subject to the king of Prussia. It lies on the W. side of the river Oder, 28 miles N. E. of Berlin. Lat. 52, 45, N. Long. 14, 43, E.

FRIO, (Cape,) a head-land of Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, South America. Lat. 23, 32, S. Long. 44, 12, W.

FRISACH, a town of Bavaria, in the archbishopric of Saltzburg, 58 miles S. E. of the city of the latter name, and subject to its metropolitan. Lat. 47, 31, N. Long. 14, 21, E.

FRISHAFF,

F R

FRISHAFF, or FRISCH-HAFF, an inland sea or bay on the coast of Prussia, in Poland. It is formed by the Isle of Frisch, and the continent at the mouth of the Vistula. It lies parallel with the Baltic coast for 60 miles in length, but of an unequal breadth, from 6 to 10 over. It begins at the territory of Dantzic, where is a very large inlet of the sea in the branch of the Vistula, which runs up to that city, and forms the port of Elbing, directly opposite to the mouth of the same river, the city of Elbing standing on another entrance of the bay a little farther E. This Frischaff is famous for sturgeon; vast quantities of which are taken here, and cured particularly at Königsberg and Dantzic, and exported to all the trading-places of Europe, especially England and Holland.

FRITTENDEN, Kent, S. E. of Staplehurst, has a fair on Sept. 8.

FRITZLAR, or FREITZLAR, a walled strong town of Hesse-Cassel, and in a territory subject to the elector of Mentz, in Germany. It has a castle, and lies in a pleasant country, abounding with corn and wine, &c. and has been often taken; it lies 23 miles S. W. of Cassel. Lat 51, 12, N. Long. 8, 43, E.

FRIULI, and AQUILEA, partly belongs to Venice, and partly to the house of Austria, in the Upper Division of Italy, by the Italians called Patria di Friuli, and the Latins, Forum Julium, and Provincia Forojulensis. It lies on the most northern verge of Italy, being bounded on the N. by the Alps, the Higher Carinthia and Carniola; on the S. by Trevisano and the gulph of Venice; on the E. by Carniola, Sicca, and part of Treviso. It has undergone a variety of changes, and has had several masters. It formerly contained (besides Il Cador, Il Casò, and La Carnia, now belonging to Venice,) the country of Goritia, and territory of Aquileia, which were taken from the patriarchs of the latter city by the house of Austria, in possession of which they still continue. This whole territory, including the Austrian and Venetian shares, is about 52 miles long from N. to S. and where broadest about 45, from E. to W. lying between lat. 45 and 46, N. and long. 13, 0, E.

FRODESHEIM, a port and market-town of Cheshire. It consists of one large street, had formerly a castle, the seat of the Savages. The town stands on the Weaver, on which is a stone bridge, with a harbour for small shipping. Its weekly market is on Wednesday, and it has two annual fairs, on May, 4, and August 21. It lies 14 miles from Chester, and 183 from London.

FRODINGHAM, a market-town in the E.

F R

Riding of Yorkshire, with two annual fairs, on July 10, and October 2. It lies 30 miles from York, and 197 from London.

FROGATHEATH, a village in Surrey, with a fair on July 16.

FROME-SELWOOD, in Somersetshire, 12 miles from Bath, 20 from Bristol, and 105 from London. It is the chief town of this part of the country, which was anciently one great forest, called Selwoodshire; and in the latter end of the last century, in those called Froomie-Woodlands, there was a considerable gang of money-coiners or clippers, of whom many were taken and executed, and their covert laid open. Though the town is bigger than some cities, yet it has only one church, a large handsome one indeed; but here are six or seven meeting-houses, of Protestant Dissenters, two of which, viz. one of the Presbyterians, and one of the Baptists, both built of white free-stone, are as handsome perhaps as any in England, and there are few more spacious.

Here is an alms-house or rather work-house, and a chapel to it, and a free-school, but the streets are very irregular and uneven. The inhabitants are reckoned about 13,000, whose chief manufactory is broad-cloth, in which it employed so many hands about the beginning of this century, that seven waggons used to be sent hence weekly with cloth, for Blackwell-Hall, London &c. but indeed all of it was not made here; for the clothiers of Whatley, Melts, and other neighbouring villages, brought their goods hither for carriage to London, and each of those waggons used to hold 140 pieces, which being valued at 14l. a cloth, one with another, made the value of the whole amount to above 700,000l. a year; and 50 years ago, more wire crads for carding the wool for the spinners were made here than in all England besides, which was for the most part supplied with them from hence; for here were no less than 20 master card-makers, one of whom employed 400 men, women, and children, in that manufactory at one time; so that even children of seven or eight years of age could earn half a crown a week. The cloths made here for the most part, are medleys of seven or eight shillings a yard.

The river here, which abounds with trout, eels, &c. rises in the woodlands, and runs under its stone bridge towards Bath, on the E. side of which it falls into the Avon. This town has been a long time noted for its fine beer, which they keep to a great age. It was governed formerly by a bailiff, and now by two constables of the hundreds of Frome, chose at the court-leet of the lord of the manor. The inhabitants of this town who had shewn their zeal for the glorious Revolution, endeavoured deavoured in the reign of king William to obtain a charter of incorporation, but in vain. Here were formerly three chanteries. The markets here are Wednesday and Sunday, and the fairs on Feb. 24, July 22, Sept. 14, and Nov. 25.

FROME, a river that rises from several springs in the western parts of Dorsetshire; the principal of which is near Evershot, and directs its course almost due W. passes under Frampton-bridge, washes the town of Dorchester, and falls into a bay of the English channel, called Poolhaven, near Wareham.

FRONSAC, in Latin, Francium, a small town of Guyenne, in France, on the Dordogne. It was a duchy-peerdom, formerly in the famous Arnaud John du Plefis, cardinal Richlieu.

FRONTEIRA, a small town of Alentejo, upon a ridge of hills, about two leagues off; the Portuguese under duke Schomberg, obtained here a signal victory over the Spaniards, in 1663. The town lies 15 miles S. of Portalegre. Lat. 38, 56, N. Long. 8, 15, W.

FRONTIGNAC, or FRONTIGNAN, a small town of Nimes and Languedoc, in France, on the brook Maguelon, and lake of Thau, not far from the Mediterranean. This place is famous for a muscadel wine, well known by its name, and muscadel raisins, called passerilles. It lies between Agde and Montpellier, 18 miles S. W. of the latter. Lat. 43, 38, N. Long. 3, 36, E.

FRONTENAC, a fort built by the French, on the river St. Laurence, about 100 leagues above Quebec, and at about a short league from its mouth, where it discharges itself into the lake Ontario, or Pretty-lake, called also Frontenac. It was erected with a view to suppress the ravages of the Iroquois. The winter at this place is much shorter than at Quebec, and the soil is so well cultivated, as to produce all sorts of European and Indian corn, with other fruits.

The fort at first was but indifferent, being only surrounded with mud-banks and pallisadoes; but afterwards, its walls, bastions, and other fortifications, were built of square stone, found here in great plenty, and ready polished by the beating of the waves of the lake, on the N. side of which it is erected. It is a square of four bastions, a quarter of a league in circuit. Its situation, indeed, has something in it that is very agreeable; the banks of the river present every way a landscape beautifully variegated; as likewise does the entrance into the lake Ontario, which is sown with islands of different magnitudes, all well wooded, on a peninsula, and near it is a good haven, where all sorts of vessels may ride in safety.

Some of the colonies which came hither, brought with them several sorts of horned cattle, fowl, and other useful animals; so that there is no want of any thing; and besides, the fortifications are greatly improved. But the misfortune is, that the advantageous communication between this lake, Montreal, and Quebec, is somewhat difficult and dangerous, on account of the river being full of rocks and water-falls, and may be easily obstructed by the ambuscades of the Iroquois, who lie on each side; so that the French abandoned the fort, and damaged those works they could not demolish, in the year 1689. But since that time they retook and repaired the place, and were in quiet possession of it till the English, under the command of colonel Bradstreet, took it in the year 1759, to whom it was confirmed at the peace in 1763.

FROXFIELD, a village of Wiltshire, on the great London road, about seven miles from Marlborough. Here is a very handsome quadrangular almshouse, founded by Sarah, dowager of John the last duke of Somerset, of the elder branch of the Seymours, for 30 poor widows; and when leases of manors for lives shall fall, for 20 more; half of the whole number to be the widows of clergymen, and half of laymen; but preferably to those of the latter, that live on her manors; with a salary of 30l. for a chaplain, and the rectory of Kemish upon a vacancy. So that upon a determination of leases, the whole annual amount is reckoned to be about 1000l. sterl.

FRUSINONE, the ancient Frusinum, a famous town of the Volci, in the time of the Romans. It stands on a hill, in the Campania di Roma, and on the eastern banks of the river Cosa, about five miles S. E. of Veroli. It gave birth to Hormisdas and Sylvester, two popes that lived in the sixth century.

FUCHANG, or PHU-YANG, a lake of Kiang-si, one of the provinces of China; in Asia, 300 miles in circuit, which receives all the rivers of Kiang-si. It issues by the great river Kiam, and is navigable by large ships. Its banks are covered with towns and villages, that carry on a considerable traffic upon the lake.

FUEGO. See TERRA DEL FUEGO.

FUENTA, (de la Regena,) a town of Navarre, in Spain, with about 500 houses, besides monasteries. It lies about twelve miles from Pamplona.

FUENTE, (Dueña,) a small town of New Castile, in Spain. It lies on the river Tagus, 40 miles S. E. of Madrid. Lat. 40, 21, N. Long. 3, 46, W.

FULDA, (territory of the abbey of,) in the Upper Rhine, in Germany; by the Germans called Buchen, and by the Latins Fagonia, both denominations from the beech-forests anciently here, but now improved to a fruitful soil, particularly

larly good wines. It is bounded on the N. by Hesse, and on the S. by Hanau, Reineck, &c. being about 25 miles long, and 12 broad. It is divided into 13 bailiwicks, and together with the town of its name, is subject to its own abbot, who is elected by friars, that must be gentlemen for 16 descents; he is primate of all the abbots in Germany and Gaul, being a prince of the empire, and immediately dependent on the pope, paying him at his installation 400 florins, or about 40l. sterl. has an annual revenue of between 20 and 30,000l. can raise 4 or 5000 men, and he keeps a magnificent household and guards; so that he is upon a level with many prelates of larger dominions. Its capital is FULDA, or FULD, an open and not very well-built town, upon a river of its own name. It is contiguous to the abbey of the Benedictine order, the noblest in Europe. The great church of St. Boniface, is a stately free-stone pile, but ancient. The monks have here three antient MSS. one of the whole New Testament, another of the Four Evangelists, and a Treatise on the Trinity.

The palace is also a stately pile of free-stone, richly furnished. Polnitz says, here are very hard drinkers, bad roads, and miserable lodgings. The famous Jesuit, Athanasius Kircher was born here. It lies 46 miles N. E. of Frankfort on the Maine. Lat. 50, 43, N. Long. 9, 46, E.

FULHAM, a pretty village of Middlesex, about four miles from London. Here is a summer-palace of the bishop of London, and the seats of several gentlemen, with a handsome wooden bridge over the Thames, and contiguous to Putney, on the other side in Surry, where horses, carriages, and foot-passengers pay toll.

FUMONE, a place in the Campania di Roma, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy, is principally remarkable for its castle standing high, in which Celestine V. chosen pope from a simple hermit, was prevailed upon by his successor Boniface VIII. to resign the papal dignity to him, who upon that is said to have closely imprisoned and starved the former to death. It stands about three miles W. of Alatri, and four N. of Ferentino.

FUNCHAL, the capital of Madeira. It is situated in 15, W. long. and 32, N. lat. round a bay on the gentle ascent of the first hills, in form of an amphitheatre. Its public and private buildings are in general entirely white, many of two stories high, and covered with low roofs. On the sea side are several batteries, and platforms with cannon. An old castle, which commands the road, stands on the top of a steep black rock, surrounded by the sea at high water, and called by the English Loo-rock. On a neighbouring eminence above the town there is another, called San Joao da Pico, or St. John's castle. The hills beyond the town serve to complete the beauty of the landscape, being covered with vineyards, inclosures, plantations, and groves, interspersed with country houses, and several churches. The city, however, is far from answering the expectations which are formed by its appearance towards the road; for the streets are narrow, ill paved, and dirty; the houses are built of free-stone, or of brick, but they are dark, and only a few of the best belonging to English merchants, or the principal inhabitants, are provided with glass-windows; all the others have a kind of lattice-work in their stead, which hangs on hinges, and may be lifted up occasionally. The churches and monasteries are very plain buildings, without any display of the architectonic art, the little light admitted into them serving only to discover heaps of tinsel ornaments, arranged in a manner truly Gothic. In the churches there are great numbers of ornaments, with pictures and images of saints; the first are, for the most part, done by mere daubers, and the latter are clothed in laced habits. A better taste prevails in some of the convents, particularly that of the Franciscans: here simplicity and neatness unite, and give us a favourable opinion of these fathers. The infirmary is also a building that does honour to the architect, and is the most considerable edifice in the whole place.

FUNDA, or FUNDI, otherwise called French-bay, a bay between New England and Acadia, or New Scotland, in North America. It is the principal among the many indentures of the sea in those parts. It runs up above 200 miles inland from Cape Sable, the most southern point of Acadie to that isthmus, which joins the peninsula to the continent. In it is a fine fishery. It is two French leagues to the river St. John, with a clear shore, and depth of water sufficient to carry the largest vessels to this lesser bay; on which stands Annapolis, the capital.

FUNEN, an island of Denmark, in Latin Fionia. It has the Great Belt on the E. the Baltic on the S. the Lesser Belt on the W. which parts its from Jutland, and the isle of Samsøe on the N. This is the most fruitful country in Denmark, with a good soil and well cultivated. It consists of small and very fertile hills, some of them woody, being in general well peopled; for on it are said to be 264 villages, with a church to each, and four garrisoned towns. From Funen are exported great quantities of corn, large herds of black cattle, and abundance of hogs. This is an appendage of the king's eldest son, and its government is the most considerable in Denmark. Its capital is Odensee.

* FURNES,

FURNES, a strong town of Flanders, in the Austrian Netherlands. It has several times been taken, but always restored to the house of Austria. It lies 12 miles E. of Dunkirk. Lat. 51, 21, N. Long. 2, 31, E.

FURSTENBERG, (principality of) in Suabia, in Germany. This is a tract not above 18 miles where broadest, and about 70 long on both sides the Danube; within the limits of it this river has its source. It is bounded on the W. by part of Brisgaw and Black forest; the latter of which parts it from Alsace; on the N. by the duchy of Wirtemberg, the county of Hohenberg, and other lands belonging to the house of Austria, the forest towns, the lordship of Nellenberg, and bishopric of Constance, lying S. of it. This country includes part of the landgraviate of Baar, of the county of Heyligenberg, &c. It was erected into a principality in 1677, whose prince is a count of the Empire, and a branch of the family of William Egon, count Furstenberg, and bishop of Straßburg, who, for betraying the city of the latter name into the hands of the French, was made a cardinal, they not being able to support his pretensions to the bishopric of Cologne, in a war that broke out in 1680, between France and the emperor, principally upon that account. This country is also watered by the river Kintzing, whence the valley through which it runs is called Kintzgerthal.

FURSTENBERG, the capital of the above-mentioned principality of its name. It stands with its castle, which is the family seat, upon a hill. It lies about a mile from the Danube, and 26 N. W. of Constance. Lat. 47, 44, N. Long. 2, 31, E.

FURSTENFELD, a town of Stiria, one of the subdivisions of Austria, in Germany. It lies 38 miles E. of Gratz, in lat. 47, 32, N. long. 16, 51, E.

FURSTENWALD, a small but pleasant town of the Middle Mark of Brandenburg, in Germany, and on the N. side of the river Spree. The Swedes took it twice, and the Imperialists burnt it. The king of Prussia has a seat here. It lies 16 miles W. of Frankfort on the Oder, and 36 N. E. of Berlin.

FURT, a strong town of Germany, in Lower Bavaria, in the territory of Straubing; it is seated on the river Cam, on the frontiers of Bohemia, and was taken by the Swedes in 1641.

FYAL, the name of one of the islands called the Azores, or Western Islands. It is well cultivated, the fields being enclosed with walls of stone, and yields wheat of the bearded sort, barley, maize or Indian corn, cucumbers, gourds, melons, water-melons, safflower, flax, lemons, oranges, plumbs, apricots, figs, pears, apples, some cabbages, and carrots, potatoes, large sweet onions, garlic, and abundance of strawberries. There are a few vineyards on the island; but the quantity of wine that is made is inconsiderable, and the quality very indifferent. Here are abundance of chestnuts, beeches, mytles, and aspen-trees. Their oxen are small, but the meat very good, as are also their sheep; and they have plenty of long-legged goats, hogs, and poultry. Their horses are small and ill looking; but asses and mules are more numerous, and more serviceable in such a hilly country. The whole country is filled with a great variety of birds, particularly quails, American woodcocks, canary-birds, black-birds, and other song-birds, with a small species of hawks, from whence these islands are called Azores, that being the Portuguese name of a hawk. The roads are much better than in Madeira, and the inhabitants are said to be far more industrious. The cottages of the common people are built of clay, and thatched with straw, and are small, but clean and cool. The people here are, in general, fairer than those of Madeira, and their dress is more decent and comfortable, consisting of coarse linen drawers, with blue or brown jackets, and boots on the legs. A shirt, jacket and petticoat is the dress of the women, whose hair is tied in a bunch behind, and whose features are not always disagreeable. When they go to town, they put on a cloak, which covers their heads, leaving only a small opening for the eyes, and is tied round the waist. The men likewise add a broad-brimmed hat and cloak on these occasions. Mr. Foster says, "that he did not see an idle person or beggar among them."

The most considerable place of the island, called Villa da Horta, lies along the shore of a bay, and rises in the form of an amphitheatre upon the hill, with an easy ascent. Its churches, monasteries, forts, and flat-roofed houses, which are mostly white, make it appear to great advantage from the sea. The hills beyond the town are adorned with gardens, groves, corn-fields, and various buildings. There are two forts that command the bay, one at each extremity of the town, which extends a mile and a quarter in length, consisting chiefly of one irregular street, intersected by a few small lanes. The pavement is made of large stones, and tolerably clean. The houses are contrived exactly like those of Madeira, with projecting balconies, which are roofed at the top, and have lattices that may be lifted up, supplying the place of windows. There are three churches in the town, dark and Gothic, like those of Madeira, and four convents; one of Franciscan Cordeliers; another, situated on an eminence, belongs to the Carmelites; another to the Capuchins; and the fourth was the college of the Jesuits, but is now converted into a court of justice, except a part that is reserved for a public school. There are besides these, two nunneries, one of the order of St. Clara, the nuns of which wear a long cloak of dark-brown serge over another of white callico. The other is occupied by nuns of the order of Our Lady of Conception. These wear white dresses, and have a piece of blue fixed on the breast, together with an image of GABARET, the capital of Gabardan, a territory of Gascony in France. It lies on the river Gileuse, not navigable four miles from Condom, to the E. It confines on Armagnac and Condomois.

GABIAN, a village of Beziers and Languedoc, in France. It is famous for mineral waters; and near it is a rock from which issues a kind of black petrol, good in several distempers: in the neighbourhood is also found a species of earth for whitening of linen.

GABIN, or GAMBIN, a small town of the palatinate of Rawa, in Great Poland. It lies 50 miles N. W. of Warsaw. Lat. 52, 41, N. Long. 19, 49, E.

GABINIANA arose from the ruins of Samaria, which had been destroyed by the high-priest Hyrcan, the son of Simon, and had such its name from Gabinus, governor of Syria, who partly rebuilt it by order of Pompey, supposed near about 60 years before Christ; but, Gabinus being soon after turned out, it advanced no higher than to a good large village. Herod therefore (in the year of the flood 2076, before Christ 23) chose to finish the work, and to restore it to its pristine splendor, because being but one day's journey (or 35 miles) from Jerusalem, he could easily make it a place of retreat in case of necessity. He adorned it with magnificent buildings, fortified it with walls and towers, and invited 6000 foreigners to come and the virgin, on a silver plate. In the bay of this island Sir W. Monson, in 1599, cut out seven Spanish ships of great value, though moored under the castle.

FYN, (Lough) or LAKE FYN, a bay or maritime gulph of Argyleshire, in the W. of Scotland, 60 miles long, and about four broad, with a considerable herring fishery. Between this lough and the inland fresh-water lake of Lochow, Argyle Proper is bounded.

fettle there, who finding the soil very fertile, became very rich in a short time. He gave it the name of Sebaste, which signifies the same in Greek as Augustus does in Latin.

GABON is the name of a river and country on the coast of S. Guinea. From cape St. Clara, the N. head of it, to the S. cape, called the Round Hill by the English, because it shows so from the sea, is three leagues, being the breadth of the mouth into the Ethiopic ocean; the middle channel whereof, betwixt the two afore-named capes, is directly under the Equinoctial line. This Rio de Gabon has its name from the Portuguese, who call it Rio de Gabaon, and others Gaba, Gabona, or Gabam. The blacks of this country are barbarous, crafty, treacherous, and thievish; and the chief trade is in elephants teeth, wax, and honey.

GABORI, (bay of) is on the S. E. coast of Cape Breton. The entrance into it, which is 20 leagues from the isles of St. Pierre, is a league in breadth, lying between islands and rocks. To every one of the former vessels may approach very near; some stretch themselves into the sea about a league and a half. The depth of this bay inland is two leagues, and here is good anchorage.

GABRIEL, (St.) an island in the river de la Plata, in Peru, discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1526.

GAD'S LOT. The tribes of Reuben and Gad had their portion of territory along the E. banks of the Jordan, between the Dead Sea and the Sea of Tiberias. Baumgarten assures, that it is yet, at this day, a country very fit for pasturage, and if cultivated, would prove extremely fruitful.

GADAMIS, or GADEMIS, a small territory just westward of the province of Faïfan, in Africa. It confines on Biledulgerid and Vhergela on the W. has a government of its own, and drives a considerable trade in slaves and dates. It abounds with castles and rich inhabitants. They pay the Turks an annual contribution for the liberty of their commerce; and they must either give the Arabs that inhabit the desert some kind of tribute, or repulse them by force of arms.

GADEBUSH, a town of Mecklenburg, in Germany, near which the Swedes obtained a signal victory over the Danes in 1712. It lies 22 miles W. of Wismar.

GADES, a city of Andalusia, in Spain. See CADIZ.

GAETA, or GAIETTA, anciently Cajeta, a well-fortified maritime town of the Lavoro, in the kingdom of Naples. It stands on a mountain or rock surrounded by the sea, except a narrow neck of land or causeway, which joins it to the continent. It is stored with every thing for its defence, and the neighbouring country is extremely pleasant and fertile.

Between it and Mola, the ancient Formia, was a village of Cicero's, thence called Formianum, where it is said that famous orator was murdered. This was the only place in the kingdom of Naples that held out any time against the Austrians, in the year 1707. It was at last taken by storm for king Charles III. afterwards the emperor Charles VI. and its two castles surrendered at discretion. It made also a good defence in 1734, when the Spaniards recovered Naples from the Austrians for Don Carlos, now king of Spain. In one of the above-mentioned castles is the unburied body of the famous Charles of Bourbon, general to the emperor Charles V. who was killed at the siege of Rome. It is kept in a room, and dressed cap-a-pee. The spot where St. Francis preached to the fishes is now separated from the sea by a wall. Gaeta is an episcopal city, with a noble cathedral, where is a white marble baptistery, with Bacchus and other sculptures, which, from a Greek inscription on it, appears to be the work of one Sculpion, an Athenian: it lies 30 miles W. of Capua. Lat. 41, 32. N. Long. 14, 36. E.

GÆTULIA. As the limits of Gætulia have not been settled by any ancient geographer, it is impossible for a modern one certainly to fix them. In Pliny's time the Gætulians possessed a part of the Tingitania. Virgil affirms that they extended themselves from the Regio Syrtica to the Atlantic; and Festus Avienus seems to have fixed their E. boundary not far from the W. confines of Mar-marica. But nothing certain of these matters can be drawn from either of these authors, or from Strabo, who only intimates the Gætulians were a large nation, taking up a considerable part of Libya Interior, and some territories near the Syrtes.

GAGO, a kingdom of Negroland, in Africa, bounded by Tombuto to the N. Dauma to the E. Guinea to the S. from which it is parted by a ridge of mountains, and Melli, with the country of the Mundingoes to the W. Yet these boundaries cannot be well ascertained, on account of vast deserts surrounding it.

GAGO, capital of the last-mentioned kingdom of its name, is without walls, and the houses inconsiderable, except those where the king and his courtiers reside. Here are rich merchants, and a great resort of negroes for cloth, with plenty of corn and flesh, but scarcity of wine and fruit: it abounds in melons, citrons, and rice; and here are several good wells. The whole kingdom is covered with villages inhabited by husbandmen and shepherds. They are grievously taxed, and very ignorant, but make no scruple to sell their wives and children for slaves. European goods are brought here in caravans from Barbary.

GAILLAC, a city of Languedoc, in France, on the river Tarn, which begins to be navigable here to Bourdeaux; it is the only part of Albigeois that produces wine fit to be exported, and thither it is conveyed by that river, and there sold. In this article their trade is considerable. Gaillac has large suburbs. It lies four leagues from Lavaur to the N. Lat. 43, 50. N. Long. 2, 38. E.

GAILLON, a town of France, in Normandy, and in the diocese of Evreux, remarkable for its magnificent palace, belonging to the archbishop of Rouen, and for its handsome Chartreuse, which is about three quarters of a mile from it. It is delightfully seated a mile and a half from the river Seine, five from Andilly, and 22 from Rouen.

GAINSBOROUGH, or GAINSBURG, a large and well-built town of Lindsey division in Lincolnshire, on the Trent. It has a large market, holden weekly, on Tuesdays. Its church was rebuilt by act of parliament in 1735; and here are several meeting-houses of Dissenters. The Danes landed at the place, when they came up the Trent, which river brings up ships of burden with the tide, though 40 miles from the Humber by water. Two annual fairs are kept here, on Easter Tuesday, and October 20. It lies 16 miles from Lincoln, and 150 from London.

GALACZ,

GALACZ, a town of Turkey in Europe, and in Bulgaria, seated near the Danube, between the mouths of the rivers Pruth and Seret.

GALAM, (kingdom of) in Guinea and Negroland, in Africa. It lies eastward of that of the Pholeys, beginning at the village of Ghilde, 142 leagues from the bar of Senegal, it extends along the river, about 45 leagues from W. to E. and ends at rock Felu. Beyond the Senegal river to the N. and N. W. it is bounded by that vast tract, where the Moors have migratory villages, and by some fixed ones of the Pholeys, subject to the Siratic. On the E. and N. E. lies the kingdom of Karon.

GALARGUES, a town of Languedoc, in France. It is a famous place for manufacturing of turnsole, into blue and red colours.

GALASO, a small river of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in Otranto: it rises in the opening near Oria, and falls into the gulph of Tarento, near the city of that name.

GALLASHIELS, a town in the shire of Selkirk, and S. of Scotland, has a good weekly market. It stands on the little river Gallia, four miles from the town of Selkirk, and 23 W. of Edinburgh.

GALATA, one of the suburbs of Constantinople, opposite to the grand signior's seraglio, and on the other side of the harbour. It has walls, towers, and ditches round it. The Greeks have six churches at Galata, and the Roman Catholics are said to have two or three. The private houses are better built in this suburb than they are generally in Constantinople; and they have taverns, which sell wine without any restraint.

GALATIA, the ancient name of a province of Asia Minor, now called Amasia. It was bounded on the E. by Cappadocia, on the W. by Bithynia, on the S. by Pamphylia, and on the N. by the Euxine Sea. It was reduced under the subjection of the Romans in the time of Augustus, and is now in the hands of the Turks. Here St. Paul founded a church, to which he directed that epistle which is still known by the name of the Epistle to the Galatians.

GALETTE, (La) a neck of land in the river St. Lawrence, belonging to Canada. From the point opposite to L'île de Montreal a road might be made to Galette, by which means 40 leagues of navigation would be avoided, which the waterfalls render almost impracticable, and always very tedious. The land about la Galette is very good; and in two days time a bark may sail from la Galette to Niagara, with a good wind. La Galette is a league and a half above the fall called Les Galots.

GALICIA, so called from its inhabitants the Gauls, or Celts, formerly a kingdom, now a province, the most N. W. in Spain. The Atlantic ocean washes it on the W. the Cantabrian sea or bay of Biscay on the N. It is bounded on the E. by Asturius or Leon, and on the S. by Portugal, from which next the sea it is parted by the river Minho. This has the most sea-coast, and the greatest number of harbours of any province in the whole kingdom, reckoned to be 48 great and small, the principal of which are Corunna and Ferrol.

Galicia produces wheat, millet, all sorts of vegetables, vast numbers of cattle, especially hogs, the bacon made from which, they say, far exceeds that of Westphalia: strong mules, good horses, though not large; but is most distinguished for its excellent wines, particularly the Ribadera produce. The turneps here grow to such a magnitude, that they often serve the children for seats to sit upon, and yet are very sweet. From its situation, this is one of the coldest countries in Spain, but is pretty well sheltered by its mountains, which besides furnish plenty of fuel and timber for house or ship building. Antient authors mention their having produced great quantities of gold, silver, and other metals; but all those mines at present are either exhausted or neglected; and only some few of marble, which is of an excellent sort, are now minded: some flax is also produced in this province, of which they make pretty good linen.

They natives speak a Spanish, so blended with the old Celtic and Portuguese, as to sound harsh, and be hardly intelligible, to those only used to the pure Castilian. They are docile, affable, and steady in their undertakings, and more laborious than the Spaniards generally are. They are under an adelantado, or lord-lieutenant, under whom the king appoints a governor, and captain general.

In this province are seven cities, a great number of towns and villages, &c. one archbishopric, and four bishoprics. Its capital is Compostella, or St. Jago de Compostella.

GALICIA, (New) or GUADALAJARA, a province of Mexico, in North America. It is bounded on the N. by New Mexico, on the E. by the gulph of Mexico, on the S. by Mexico Proper, and on the W. by the Pacific ocean, and the gulph of California. See GUADALAJARA.

GALILEE, the most northern part of Palestine, now a province of Asiatic Turkey. It anciently extended beyond the great plain of Jezreel. It was divided into High and Low: the former was on the other side Jordan, and filed Galilee of the Gentiles, as mostly inhabited or intermingled with them; the other was richer and more fertile, except in the very northernmost part, and in its flourishing state was full of towns and villages, all all well-inhabited. It lies to the N. on mount Libanus, to the E. on the river Jordan, and the sea of Galilee, and on the S. by the river Chifon, and to the W. on the Mediterranean. In this province formerly stood the cities of Capernaum, Chorrazim, and Bethsaida, long since destroyed, so that their exact situation is now unknown.

GALINHAS, an island of New Guinea, it lies near the main land of Bissos. It had its name Das Galinhas from the Portuguese, from the vast multitude of Pintada hens on it. The course of St. Martin's Point to this island is N. E. There is a passage between it and the continent, but not safe; therefore that between this and that of the Sorcerer's, bearing S. E. from the road of the town of Bissos, is more eligible in seven fathoms water.

GALINHAS, (river,) in S. Guinea, had name like as the foregoing, but is by the natives called Magualbary, having its source in the lands of Hondo. It has two islands at its mouth. The Europeans trade in it, and carry thence dry hides and elephants teeth, which are brought down the river.

GALL, (St.) the city and republic of, a fine large town in the Upper Thourgaw, in Switzerland. It stands in a narrow and barren valley, shut in on the N. and W. by mountains, and watered by the little river Steinhah. It is walled and fortified with towers. Here are spacious streets, good houses, and several public structures, as two churches, &c. besides the convent of St. Catharine, where is a public library. It is a republic, but has no territory, as the neighbouring country belongs to the abbey. The legislative power is lodged in the hands of two councils, and the inhabitants are reckoned at 10,000, who are mostly employed in the linen manufacture, making annually 40,000 pieces of cloth, 200 ells each, the export of which enriches them considerably, it being one of the wealthiest places in Switzerland. They are Protestants; whence a few years ago, a monk carrying his cross erected through the town, attended with several peasants, a tumult ensued, so that a war was like to have been the consequence between the abbey and the town, but the difference was compromised, upon the townsmen paying 2000 crowns for the insult done the monks, and these again engaged to make no more processions in the town.

The town of St. Gall, is situated near the lake of Constance, and upon the road from Germany to Italy, serves as the channel of communication between one country and the other, and their halls are for warehouses to the goods that go and come. The people are all strict Calvinists, who spread themselves into divers parts for traffic, even, they say, as far as Spain; where, though Protestants, they trade under the king's protection. The town is separated from the abbey only by a gate, which the abbot shuts on one side, and the burghers on the other.

VOL. I.—No. 47.

GALL, (St.) patrimony of, subject to its own abbot, who is an ally of the Swissers. It lies between the canton of Zurich and the lake of Constance.

This abbacy is about 14 miles long, and 10 broad, all round the town of St. Gall, being able to raise 5 or 6000 men. The convent and palace are in the town of St. Gall, but the abbot generally resides at Wyl or Weil. The abbot, as well as the city, send a deputy to the diet of the Thirteen Cantons, in which they have a seat, but no vote. This abbey, from the year 800 to 1100, was a sort of academy that produced great numbers of learned men. Its principal town is Roschach.

GALLAPAGO, (Islands of,) a great number of small uninhabited islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying under and on both sides the equator. The easternmost is about 110 leagues from the Terra Firma or Main, that is in long. 85, W. from London; and the others between that and long. 90. W. Here ships frequently refit, and take in water and provisions; but the Spaniards have never sent any colonies thither; yet they, being the first discoverers, report them to be very numerous, stretching N. E. from the line as far as five degrees N. but Dampier says he saw not above 14 or 15. Some of them are seven or eight leagues long, and three or four broad; most of them being flat and even at top; 4 or 5 of the easternmost are rocky, barren, and hilly, producing neither tree, herb, nor grass; only a few dillio-trees, except by the sea side. On these barren islands water is found in ponds and holes among the rocks.

Some others of these islands are more plain and low, and the soil more fertile, producing trees of several sorts unknown in Europe. Some of the westernmost of these islands are 9 or 10 leagues in length, and 6 or 7 in breadth, with a deep and black mould. These produce trees of large tall bodies, especially mammee-trees, which grow here in large groves.

In these large islands are some pretty considerable rivers, and in many of the smaller ones are brooks of good water. The Spaniards, upon the first discovery of these islands, found multitudes of guanos and tortoises, or land-turtles; and Dampier says, he believes no place in the world is so plentifully stored with them.

On these islands are some green snakes, but no other land-animals that Dampier ever saw. Here is great plenty of turtle-doves, so tame, that four or five dozen of them may be killed in a forenoon.

with a flick; they are something less than a pigeon, are commonly fat, and very good meat. Between these islands are good wide channels fit for ships to pass, and shoal water in some places, producing plenty of turtle-grass; and therefore these islands are plentifully stored with sea-turtles of that sort, called the green-turtle.

The air of the Gallapagos is temperate, considering the climate. The time for the rains is in November, December, and January; in which months there is often very hard tempestuous weather, mixed with much thunder and lightning; some time before and after are moderate refreshing showers; but in May, June, July, and August, the weather is always very fair.

GALLBALLY, a town in the county of Tipperary, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It lies 28 miles S. E. of Limerick.

GALLI, a people of Africa, in Abyssinia, great enemies to the Abyssinians, from whom they have taken several provinces. They are a wild, cruel people, and live chiefly on their flocks and herds, and by robbing. They are circumcised, have as many wives as they please, and are continually roving from one place to another.

GALLIPOLI, anciently Callipolis, a small, but very strong, and well-inhabited town of Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples. It stands on a rock, quite furrounded by the sea, and communicating with the main land only by a bridge, which is defended by a good fort. Its episcopal see, subject to that of Otranto, is only within the town; and its harbour has been long destroyed. It lies 30 miles W. of the city of Otranto. Lat. 40, 32, N. Long. 18, 15, E.

GALLIPOLI, anciently Callipolis, a populous town of Romania, in European Turkey; it is said to contain 10,000 Turks, and 4000 Christians, besides numbers of Jews. It has a spacious harbour on the famous strait of its name, among many others, which divides Europe from Asia, anciently called Hellespont, now the Dardanelles. It lies 120 miles S. W. of Constantinople; and it was the first town in Europe which the Turks made themselves masters of. Lat. 40, 51, N. Long. 27, 46, E.

GALLO, PUNTO GALLO, or POINT DE GALLE, a town with a harbour and fort on the S. W. part of the island of Ceylon, in the Indian Ocean, in Asia. It was taken by the Dutch from the Portuguese, in 1658; and by the English, in 1781.

The houses are handsome, the churches well-built, and it has several fountains and gardens. The bay, though capacious, is a dangerous road, on account of the westerly winds and sunken rocks in it. The entrance is defended by forts. Most of the town lies high, and defended towards the sea by sharp pointed rocks, upon one of which is a court of guard, and the Dutch flag displayed on a high mast. The jurisdiction of this town brings the Dutch 15,000 crowns annually. And all ships passing this way are obliged to stand in towards the cape, in order to avoid the Maldiv rocks. Lat. 6, 3, N. Long. 78, 41, E.

GALLO, a pretty high island of Terra Firma, in S. America. It lies in the Pacific Ocean or South Sea, and near the coast of Peru. Almost round it the water is pretty shallow, and at the N. and S. points of it are several rocks. Into the harbours of this island the buccaneers use to put, in order to refit, there being plenty of wood and water upon it, also several good sandy bays for cleaning a vessel. The land here is higher than the coasts of Gorgona, and very full of hills and trees, particularly a very high mount. This island was the first place which the Spaniards possessed themselves of upon their attempting the conquest of Peru. Lat. 3, 12, N. Long. 83, 10, W.

GALLO, a town in the marquise of Ancona, one of the Ecclesiastical States, in the Middle Division of Italy. It lies 14 miles S. of Ancona city. Lat. 43, 41, N. Long. 14, 36, E.

GALLOWAY, (Mull of,) a peninsula in the western part of the shire of Wigton, in the S. Division of Scotland. It is the ancient Chersonesus, or Promontorium Novantum. Galloway evidently bears in it the name of its ancient natives, and who till of late spoke the Highland language; it is divided into two districts, that towards the W. already mentioned, and the other towards the E. beginning at the middle of the bridge at Dumfries, and called the Stewarty of Kircudbright. It is one continued heath, and proper for grazing small cattle.

Galloway, for its magnitude, abounds with more gentlemen's seats than any part of Scotland; so that wherever you meet with a grove of trees, there is always sure to be a laird's house, commonly in an old stone-tower. It lies due W. from Dumfries; and as that part of it called the Upper Galloway, runs out farther into the Irish sea than the rest, all that bay on the S. side might be reckoned part of Solway frith, as all on the N. side is called the frith of Clyde, though near 50 miles from the river of the latter name. From the utmost shores of the Mull of Galloway, you see the coast of Ireland as plain as Calais from Dover.

Though the neighbouring seas seem to hold an inexhaustible treasure, which the inhabitants do not make the utmost advantage of, yet they are great husbandmen and breeders of cattle, sending annually to England upwards of 50,000 head. Besides, they have the best breed of low, strong, and thick thick horses in Europe, from the country called Galloways, and vended greatly in the northern counties of England. They are hardy, easy goers, soon broken, and not readily tired. Some of the inhabitants follow fishing, as well in the sea as in their rivers and loughs, which lie every where under the hills, catching incredible numbers of excellent eels about September. This part of the country is very mountainous, and some hills prodigiously high, but covered with sheep and cattle; the gentlemen hereabouts being the greatest sheep-masters, as they stile themselves, and breeders of black cattle, and horses, in the whole kingdom. This country gives the title of earl to one of the Stuart family.

GALLOWAY, commonly GALLWAY, (in Irish Gallivie, from the Galleci, according to Camden; but it seems rather derived from the original natives the Galloni or Gaeles, and of the same pedigree with Galloway in Scotland,) a fortified town, and the capital of a county of its name, in the province of Connaught, in Ireland. It stands on an island near the fall of Lough Corbes or Corrib, into the bay of the same name and that of Galloway, in the Western Ocean. It has a large and safe harbour very commodiously situated for foreign trade to France, Spain, and the West-Indies, &c. Here are barracks for 10 companies of foot. This was the last place, by the surrender of which Ireland was reduced in the reign of king William III. after the battle of Aughrim and siege of Limerick. It lies 17 miles from Tuam, and 103 from Dublin. In Oliver's time a plague swept off 12,000 of its inhabitants in 18 months.

GALLWAY, a county of Ireland, referred to in the last article, and belonging to the province of Connaught. It is bounded on the S. and S. E. by part of Roscommon, King's county, and Tipperary, from which last it is parted by the Shannon; on the W. by the main ocean; by Mayo, Meath and Roscommon on the N. and N. E. and by Thomond on the S. This is one of the largest counties in that kingdom. Its dimensions are variously given, by some said to be 82 miles long, 48 broad; but both are indeed very unequal. The soil being much on a warm lime-stone, rewards the labours of the husbandman, abounding in general with corn, and pasture for black and small cattle.

The S. and E. parts are best inhabited. Its W. side runs out into a peninsula, is much indented by small bays, and bordered all along with a mixture of green islands and rugged rocks, among which are four islands called South Arran, that form a barony. It sends two knights for the shire to the Irish parliament, and two each, for Galloway, Athenree, and Tuam. Its Protestant inhabitants suffered much in the massacre of 1641.

GALLWAY, (bay of,) in the county last-mentioned. It runs above 30 miles inland, with innumerable harbours and roads on every side. It has one of the noblest entrances in the world. It is sheltered at the mouth by the S. isles of Arran, through which there are three passages for shipping, besides the N. passage at the mouth of the bay. Here is a considerable herring-fishery in the season. One of the finest harbours in it is Batteredbay.

GALLUS, a great river of Bythmia, which sprung from mountains in Phrygia Major. It is storied, that the priests of Cybele, known by the name of Galli, were all eunuchs; and that the waters of this river, plentifully drank, were believed to inspire them with such a frantic enthusiasm, that they with their own hands would perform the operation on themselves without the least reluctance.

GALTRES, a forest a little N. of the city of York, very thick of trees in some places, in others very moorish and boggy. It formerly extended to the city-gates; but now several considerable villages are built in it.

GAMACHES, a town of France, on the confines of Normandy and Picardy, with the title of a marquifate, and it has a handsome castle, and a collegiate church. It is seated on the river Bresle, and is partly in the diocese of Rouen, and partly in that of Amiens.

GAMALA, once a city of Galilee, situated over against Tarichea, on the lake of Genezareth.

GAMBIA, a large river of Negroland in Africa, and thought to be a branch of the Niger; it empties itself into the Atlantic ocean. It is practicable by sloops 600 miles inland, according to the accounts of such English factors as have gone so far up its course in quest of gold, but without any success. The land is low towards its mouth, but higher up the country it is rocky and mountainous, being covered also with woods. Along its banks are great numbers of towns inhabited by several nations, but mostly Negroes. Some are of an olive colour, called Pholeys or Fulis, who live like the Arabs, and speak Arabesque, being Mahometans, as most of the Negroes N. of the river are; whereas those to the S. of it are Pagans.

The principal British settlement on this river is James-island, 10 leagues from its mouth, almost in the middle of the stream, and three miles from the nearest shore on either side. It is less than a mile in circuit, has a fort mounted with cannon, and a small garrison, which maintain their right of trading.

trading in the river Gambia. Here are factors also on either shore, for several hundred miles up the river. These settlements belonged to the African company, but are now vested in the crown. The trade carried on here with the natives consists principally in gold, slaves, elephants-teeth, and bees-wax. The Gambia, having a long course within the tropics, annually, about mid-summer, overflows the flat country on its banks, like the Nile, &c. arising from the periodical rains, which swell their streams.

GAMS. See GASTER.

GANARA, a kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, lying on the river Niger, and capital of a kingdom of the same name, though some call it Guangara. Besides this, there are nothing but small villages, though the country is very populous. It lies very far to the E. and almost borders upon Abyssinia; and travellers affirm, that there is a good deal of gold in the S. parts. The roads are unpassable for camels; and therefore their commodities are carried on men's shoulders.

GANDERSHEIM, an abbey of Brunswick, in Germany, bordering upon Hildesheim. It was formerly more considerable. Its abbess has a seat among the prelates of the Rhine, and both she and the nuns are Lutherans. The bailiwick of its jurisdiction is two miles in circuit, containing a castle on the Ganda, where it runs into the Leina, with about 20 villages.

GANDIA, or GUADIA, a city and sea-port of Valencia, in Spain. It lies on the banks of the river Alcoi, near the Mediterranean, is fenced by a wall, and has a strong old castle, the place containing 1200 families in one collegiate parish, with two monasteries, and a nunnery. Here is an university. It lies 31 miles S. of the city of Valencia. Lat. 39, 21, N. Long. 25, 0, W.

GANDICOT, or GUENDICOT, a city of Malabar, in the mogul empire, in Asia. It stands on a high mountain, to which there is but one narrow ascent, and one gate to enter it from the plain; it has three good free-stone walls and moats. Here was a pagod, containing several idols of gold, silver, &c. When the king of Bishnagar took the place, in 1652, he melted them down into guns. Foot-posts carry letters here with more speed than horsemen, because at the end of every two leagues a man stands at a hut to run away with them to the next stage. Most of the roads are planted with rows of trees. Criminals are seldom imprisoned here, but punished directly with loss of life or limb, or else instantly discharged.

GANGEA, the capital of a territory in Schirwan, and empire of Persia, in Asia. It stands on the other side of the river Kur, in a delightful plain, with several rivulets of water. Here are magnificent bazars or market-places, and caravanseras or inns. As this city is well situated for trade, here are vast numbers of foreigners. The governor's palace is very spacious; and a fine river runs through the town, where are many gardens, plenty of very good wine, fruit, &c. It lies 15 miles N. W. of Baku and the Caspian sea, and 124 N. E. of Erivan. Lat. 41, 12, N. Long. 47, 5, E.

GANGES, a considerable river of the Hither India, in Asia. It rises in the mountains of Nigracut, which divide India from Tartary, receiving several streams in its way. It runs from N. W. to the S. E. about 1586 miles through the Mogul's dominions, and empties itself by several channels (our charts reckon them about a dozen) into the bay of Bengal. The common passage for European shipping is up one of its most western branches, called Huguely river. Its water is sweet, light, and clear, and is observed to keep better at sea, than any other water, that of the Thames alone excepted. This river is highly esteemed in India, the natives ascribing great sanctity to its waters; for which reason several hundred thousand pilgrims visit it annually, who pay homage to this river as to a god; and carry their dying friends from remote countries to be dipped for the expiation of their sins, or to expire on its banks, and as soon as they die, throw them into the middle of it.

This river is very deep, its water is at the lowest in April or May, but the periodical rains falling soon after, the flat country contiguous to it is overflowed for several miles before the close of September, at which time the waters begin to retire, but leave such a prolific mud on the soil, as renders Bengal the most fruitful province in all India for every sort of grain, and the inhabitants have ponds for preserving the water of it against a drought. The spring tides usually rise here to about 10 feet; but of late years such inundations and storms have happened, that the towns near the shore have been greatly damaged, and some of the ships in the river cast away. On the most westerly branch of the Ganges above-mentioned, the English have some factories, particularly at Fort William, Huguely, &c. as also the French and Dutch.

GANI, or COLOUR, a town of Golconda in the Hither India, in Asia. In its neighbourhood is a very rich diamond-mine, where about 60,000 people are employed; and in this mine was particularly found that large gem of 900 carats, which was presented to Aureng-Zeb. It lies 131 miles E. of Bagnagar, and is subject to the great mogul. Lat. 15, 46, N. Long. 82, 12, E.

GANJAM, the most eastern town of Golconda, in

in the Hither India, in Asia. Here is an English factory, and a river, but not navigable; nor is the bar, about a mile below the town, passable till September, when the freshes open it, and it is shut again in November. Here is a pagod dedicated to an obsece god. The adjacent country produces timber for building, bees-wax, stick-lack, and pretty good iron. The inland inhabitants manufacture cotton-cloth for exportation. The seas abound with good fish, and the rivers with the best mullets. The factory is about 58 leagues to the N. E. of Vizagapatam.

GANNAT, a town of Bourbonnois in France, bordering on Auvergne, and on the banks of a small river between Moulins and Clermont, seven miles from each. It contains about 2500 inhabitants, is the seat of an election, and has a salt-granary.

GANOS, a place in Canada, where the Ohio, or Fair River, joins that of St. Lawrence. It is 60 leagues above the mouth of the latter, and 10 leagues more by land to the right hand, before one comes to the Ohio. At Ganos is a spring, the water of which is like oil, and tastes ferruginous. A little farther is another of quite the same nature, which the savages make use of against all sorts of pains.

GAOGA, a kingdom of Africa, lying on the eastern extremity of Negroland. It is bounded on the E. by Nubia, on the N. by Tagua, on the W. by Gangara, and on the S. by Bournio. It is about 500 miles in length, and as many in breadth. The inhabitants are little better than brutes, especially those that dwell in the mountains, and they always go naked. The houses are nothing but pitiful huts; but they have plenty of cattle. Between this kingdom and the river Nile there is a desert, which reaches as far N. as the frontiers of Egypt.

GAP, the capital city of Gapençois, in Upper Dauphiny, in France. It lies at the bottom of a hill, on the little river Bene, but has been much reduced by intestine and foreign irruptions, having been burnt by the duke of Savoy in 1692, though since rebuilt. It is the see of a bishop, suffragan to Aix in Provence; 22 miles W. of Embrun. Lat. 44, 28; N. Long. 5, 55, E.

GAPENCOIS, a subdivision of Upper Dauphiny, in France. It is bounded to the E. and S. by Provence, to the W. by Diois, and to the N. by Gravisvaudan. Its capital is the above-mentioned Gap.

GARACK, a considerable isle of Asia, in the gulph of Persia, remarkable for the fine pearls fished up on its coasts. Long. 49, 40, E. Lat. 28, 45, N.

GARAUP, a promontory of Provence, in France, not a great way from Antibes, which extending itself considerably into the sea, forms the bay of Cannes.

G A

GARABUSA, a small island of the Archipelago, in European Turkey, has a fort within a sea-port of the same name on the western side, about 22 miles from Canea to the N. W.

GARDA, a town of the Veronese, on a lake of its name, in the Upper Division of Italy. It has a castle also called Garda, on the E. side of the lake. It lies 25 miles N. W. of Verona, and is subject to the Venetians. In its neighbourhood happened a very sharp rencontre between a detachment of French and another of the Imperials, in 1704. Lat. 45, 25, N. Long. 11, E.

GARDA, (Lake of) in the Venetian territory last mentioned. It is about 30 miles long from S. to N. and about 10 where broadest, contracting itself towards the N. In some seasons it is very tempestuous, and dangerous sailing upon it, otherwise very pleasant, yielding multitudes of eels, and surrounded on all sides with olive, fig, lemon, orange, and other fruit-trees, which thrive here extremely, having on one side a southern exposure, and on the other sheltered by mountains from the north winds. In some parts, as Dissentano, on its S. coast, are produced those excellent fish and wines called carpiano, and muscatello; otherwise vino santo, or priest-wine.

GARDE, an ancient bridge of France, in Lower Languedoc, built by the Romans, over the river Gardon, 12 miles from Nismes, and five from Uzes. It is built with free-stone, of a surprising magnitude, and has three rows of arches one above another. The lower row has 35 arches, and is 300 paces in length.

GARDELEBEN, or GARDELEGEN, so called from the neighbouring gardens, anciently Isoburgum, a town in the Old Mark of Brandenburg, in Germany. It belongs to the king of Prussia. To it runs a river called Bise or Milde; others place it at its source. Here is an old fort, in the language of the country called Iron-jaws. It trades principally in beer and hops, as good as any in the empire, and bought up by the Danes and others. The neighbouring territory is sandy, except towards Calb, which is very fertile, and has fine meadows. It lies 48 miles N. W. of the city of Brandenburg. Lat. 52, 38, N. Long. 11, 48, E.

GARDINER'S-ISLAND, a small island about five miles long, and one broad, at the E. end of Long Island, New York, on which are two pretty villages.

GARED, a modern town of Sus in Africa, built by Sherif Abdalla, near the source of a brook which turns several corn and sugar mills, and falls into into the Sus. The quantity of Morocco leather dressed here is so considerable, that the duty of what is exported into Europe, is said to amount to 34,000 ducats. Here is commonly a governor of the sherrif, and about 300 horse, mostly quartered in the neighbouring villages.

GARET, a province of the kingdom of Fez, in Barbary. It is a mountainous country, but has good iron-mines, and is well peopled, except towards the S. which is a desert, and without water. The principal town is Melilla.

GARGANO, or S. ANGELO, from a town near it of the latter name, or Monte S. Angelo, a headland at the foot of Monte Gargani, in the Capitanate of Naples, and Lower Division of Italy, where stands the oldest and most celebrated convent of this kingdom, that of Monte Cassino excepted.

GARIOCH, a district of Aberdeenshire, in the N. of Scotland, surrounded by those of Strathboggie, Mar, Formartin, and part of Buchan. It extends near 14 miles from E. to W. and eight from N. to S. It lies in a valley, watered by two large rivers, besides smaller streams, having several mountains on both sides, particularly that of Beunachy, rising so high with seven tops as to be at sea, though near 14 Scottish miles from the coast. In this district is plenty of game, birds, especially partridges and lapwings; but not much pasture, the grounds being black heath or moor. Garioch is the seat of a presbytery, containing 15 parishes.

GARONNE, anciently GARUMNA, a river of France, which rising in the Pyrenean mountains of Aure, in the valley of Aaran, and county of Comenges, whence it keeps a N. W. course, passes by Thoulouse, and becomes navigable near Muret. It receives several rivers in its way; and, after uniting with the Dordogne near Bec d'Ambez, it takes the name of Garonne, and near La Tour de Cordouan, falls through two channels, called Le Pas d'Anes, and Le Pas de Grave, into the Atlantic ocean. It communicates with the Mediterranean by means of the famous royal canal made in Languedoc by Riquet, in the reign of Lewis XIV. The tides flow up the Garonne as far as Langon and St. Macaire, being about 30 French leagues from its mouth, and 29 above Bourdeaux.

GARRAN, a river in Herefordshire, which runs into the Wye at Llangarran.

GARRISON, a town in the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, in Ireland; so called probably from the barracks in it: it lies 14 miles S. of Ballishannon.

GARSTANG, a market-town of Lancashire, on the post-road, lying between Lancaster and

G A

Preston, about 12 miles from the latter, and 223 from London. It has three annual fairs, on Holy Thursday, on July 21, and December 3.

GARTZ, a walled town of Upper Pomerania, in Germany, and one of the passes of the Oder. Under its jurisdiction are eight parishes, and it has several annual fairs.

GASCONY, properly so called, with Guyenne, constitutes one of the governments of France. It contains all that part which lies S. of the river Garonne; and to the N. E. of the Pyrenean mountains; it is bounded on the E. by Armagnac; on the N. by Bazadois, on the W. by part of the sea of Biscay, on the S. by Bearn. Its capital is Bayonne. In Latin Gascony is called Gasconia, from the Vasconi, or Gasconi, the modern Basques or Vasques who inhabit the Pyrenean mountains in Spain, and settled on the northern side of them about the close of the sixth century. It was subject to the dukes of Aquitaine, consequently to the kings of England, successors to William the Conqueror, till about the eleventh century, when it became annexed to the crown of France. It is subdivided into the territories of Bazadois, Condomois, the duchy of Albret, the small districts of Gabardan, Marfan, Turfon, Chalosse, Landes or Lannes, Laboar or Labourd, Soule, and Armagnac. The inhabitants of Gascony are distinguished among all the natives of France, and indeed of Europe, for the romantic and boasting strain commonly observed among them: so that an immoderate swelling of any kind has obtained the name of a Gasconade, otherwise called a rodomantade.

GASPE, or GACHEPE, (the bay and headland of) lies a little to the S. of Cape des Rosiers, in Canada. Below this bay one sees a sort of island, which in reality is no other than a steep rock, about 30 toises long, 10 high, and four broad. One would take it for the point or slope of an old wall; and it is assured, that it was formerly joined to mount Joli, which lies opposite to it on the continent. This rock has in its middle an opening in the form of an arch, through which a Biscayan chaloupe may pass under sail; and on this account it has had the name of L'Isle Percée. The natives of the district of Gaspé are commonly distinguished by the names of the rivers along whose banks they live, the three principal of which are, St. Jean, Ristigonetie, and Mizamiche, or Miramichi, and by the French, St. Croix. They are tall and well shaped, civil and hospitable; and their women handsome and chaste.

With regard to Gaspé itself, it is not remarkable for any thing, only that it takes its name from the bay on which it is situated, and which lies between the Cape des Rosiers, and L'Isle Percée, or the Hollow Island, above mentioned. Besides this bay, are two other noted ones upon the coast, namely, Des Chaleurs and Campsieus; all which are mostly frequented by fishermen, who commonly catch salmon, jack, cod, porpoises, and the like.

GASPE, the capital of a territory called Gaspesia, in Canada Proper, extending itself along the eastern coasts of this province, from Cape des Rosiers, at the mouth of St. Lawrence river to another promontory which lies opposite to Cape Breton, about 110 leagues, and stretches much farther inland.

GASSENHOVEN, or GUTZENHOVEN, a town of the Austrian Netherlands, six miles E. of Tirlemont, and 18 of Louvain. It lay within the French lines, when forced by the duke of Marlborough in 1705; and from that post most of the troops and artillery were drawn, that made any resistance. Lat. 50, 49, N. Long. 4, 56, E.

GASTEN-BATH, famous waters in the archbishopric of Saltzburg and electorate of Bavaria, in Germany, good for the stone, cholic, the venereal, and other malignant distempers, by bathing in them only, without drinking, which feel very hot, and taste strong of several minerals.

GASTER, or GASTEL, and GAMS, two small bailiwicks of Saragans in the county of Baden, in Switzerland, jointly possessed by the cantons of Schwitz and Glaris. The former, called by the Grisons Castra Rhaetia, is a long slip E. of the river Lint, extending from N. E. to S. W. between the lakes of Zurich and Wahlstadt, having the Lint and part of those two lakes in the front, and Tockebourg on the back of it, with the canton of Zurich on the N. and Saragans on the S. E. Here are people of both religions.

Gams is a small bailiwick between the barony of Alt-Saxe, Tockebourg, and the county of Werderberg. When there is a bailiff from the canton of Schwitz in one of them, there is another from that of Glaris in the other.

GATINOIS François, in contradistinction from Gatinois Orleanois, a territory in the Isle of France. Its Latin name is Pagus Vastinensis.

GATE, a chain of mountains running from N. to S. through the middle of the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia.

GATH, or GETH, once a strong and populous city of the tribe of Dan, in Judea, now in Asiatic Turkey, till king David took and dismantled it. By the various changes it underwent, and the frequent shifting of its masters, it became of little consideration, till, in the Christian times Eulx, king of Jerusalem, built a castle on its ruins. It was anciently the boundary of the Philistine territory on the S. as Ekron was that on the N. Between both which inclusive, lay those cities that composed the five Satrapies of that brave nation. It is no easy matter to fix the right situation, there having been many cities of the same name in this district, some of which were distinguished by an appellative, as Gath-Epher, Gath-Rimon, &c. and others without any.

GATTON, under the side of a hill, just by Ryegate in Surrey, is a borough by prescription, since the 29th of the reign of Henry VI. It was formerly a large town, though now only a village, without either market or fair, whose constable, chosen every year out of the lord of the manor's court, returns two members to parliament. Roman antiquities are frequently found here. It lies 18 miles from London.

GAVEREN, or WAVEREN, a town of Flanders, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the E. side of the Scheld. Near it the Confederates and French frequently encamped, and had several smart engagements, in the late wars. Here also the brave general, count Lothum, after passing the Scheld on November 30, 1708, with a part of the allied army, in order to relieve Brussels, forced the French out of their entrenchments. It lies eight miles N. E. of Oudenarde, and 10 S. W. of Ghent. Lat. 50, 49, N. Long. 3, 41, E.

GAVI, a town of Italy, in the territory of Genoa, standing on the river Lerno; towards the confines of Montserrat. It is very strongly seated; but the fortifications are not kept in repair. It is 15 miles N. of Genoa, and 12 E. S. E. of Alefandrino. Long. 8, 57, E. Lat. 44, 37, N.

GAUDENS, a very populous town of France, and capital of the Nebousan, seated on the river Garonne, five miles N. E. of St. Bertrand; Long. 1, 2, E. Lat. 43, 8, N.

GAUGAMELA, (or more properly GUAGAMELA) though but a small village (of Persia says Stephanus, of Assyria say others) is, and ever will be, memorable for the battle fought there in the year of the world 3975, of the flood 2668, before Christ 331, between Alexander and Darius, when the former routed the army of the latter, consisting of 1,10,000 men, horse and foot, with a dreadful slaughter, and took numbers of prisoners; and pursued Darius himself 10 miles, Parmenio taking Darius' baggage, elephants, and camels: so that it absolutely decided the fate of Asia.

GAUL, the ancient name of France; but it comprehended also the northern part of Italy, &c. Its inhabitants were likewise called Gauls, the same people with the Celtæ or Celts.

GAUR;

G A

GAUR, a district of Chorassan, in Persia. It borders on India in Asia.

GAVURDO, a town of Bresciano, one of the Venetian territories, in the Upper Division of Italy, on the river Weise. It lies about seven miles W. of the lake Di Garda. Hither the Imperialists retired after the defeat they received at Garcinado, April 19. 1705. Lat. 45, 28, N. Long. 35, 41, E.

GAYWOOD, a village, in Norfolk, a mile E. of King's Lynn, with a fair, kept in the village itself, on June 14, for horses; and another, held at the custom-house quay of Lynn, on October 6.

GAZA, or HASA, once a large and strong city of the tribe of Dan, in Judea, and one of the chief satrapies of the Philistines. It underwent several vicissitudes, till St. Luke mentions it in the Acts, as a ruined place. It stood on a hill near the Mediterranean, and its port was Majama.

GAZA, (New,) lies two miles from the Mediterranean, retaining still a great many monuments of its former grandeur, as marble colonades, &c. It is not of a large circuit; but is fenced with two strong iron-gates, opposite to which is the basha's seraglio, and not far off are the remains of a Roman castle, the materials of which no hammers can break.

GAZA, a city in Bactria, the walls of which were of mud, and low. Alexander took it by storm, burnt the city, killed all the males, and gave all the plunder and women to his soldiers.

GAZA, or GAZÆ, the metropolis of Atropatene, in Media, was situated, according to Pliny, in a spacious plain between Ecbaton and Artaxata, and equally distant from both.

GAZNA, a city of Asia, once much celebrated, and the capital of a very extensive empire; but which is now either entirely ruined, or become of so little consideration, that it is not taken notice of in our books of geography. This city was anciently an emporium and fortress of Sablestan, not far from the confines of India. During the vast and rapid conquest of the Arabs, all this country had been reduced under their subjection. On the decline of the power of the khalifs, however, the vast empire established by Mahomet and his successors was divided into a number of independent principalities, most of which were but of short duration. In the year of Hegira 384, answering to the 994th of the Christian æra, the city of Gazna, with some part of the adjacent country, was governed by Mahmud Gazni; who became a great conqueror, and reduced under his subjection a considerable part of India, and most of Persia.

But this empire was over-run and entirely subdued with all its cities in the beginning of the 13th century by Jenghiz Khan.

G E

GEARON, in Persia, according to Gemelli, situate 30 miles from Mokah, in the road towards Bander-Congo, and is described by him as a city looking more like a wood, because its houses are scattered among abundance of palm-trees. It is seated in a sandy plain, encompassed with high mountains, and, though small, has a vizier with ample jurisdiction. The houses are not amiss, many of them being of a composition of lime and stone, which is rare in Persia, most being of mud.

GEBA. 1 Sam. xiii. 3. we read that Jonathan the son of Saul, smote the garrison of the Philistines that was in Geba. Now among the cities of Benjamin, mentioned Joshua xviii. we read of Geba, Gibeath, and Gibeon; and Joshua xxi. 17. we read, that the two cities given to the children of Aaron out of the tribe of Benjamin were Gibeon and Geba.

GEEL, a river of the Austrian Netherlands, which rising in the S. E. part of Brabant, runs from thence N. near the confines of Liege, and passing by Lande and Leaw, falls into the Demer below Halen.

GEEL, one of the most ancient baronies of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, and territory of Antwerp; where is a fine collegiate church and chapter. Here is also a college for the Latin tongue, under the direction of secular priests, famous all over the country, and a hospitable nunnery. In its district are 19 villages.

GEERVLEIET, the principal town in the island of Voorne, in Holland, is situated amidst fruitful fields; which, besides corn, produce a turf and prickly sort of Spanish broom, which providentially prevent those sandy downs from being carried away by the wind, and save the country from inundations.

GEGENBACH, GENGEBACH, or JENGEBACH, a town of Ortnau, in Suabia, in Germany, with a monastery, whose abbot is a prince of the empire. The inhabitants are entirely Roman Catholic. Marshal Villars took this place in 1703. It stands on the river Kintseh, 12 miles S. E. of Strasburg, and 18 N. of Friburg. Lat. 48, 41, N. Long. 7, 56, E.

GEILLDORFF, a town of Germany in Suabia, seated near the river Kocher, with a castle that belongs to the lords of Limpurg.

GEISLINGEN, one of the 40 bailiwicks or lordships belonging to the territory of the city of Ulm, in Suabia, in Germany. It comprehends the greatest part of the county of Helfenstein.

GUELDERLAND, including Zutphen, and exclusive of Prussian Guelderland, a province of the United Netherlands, bounded on the N. by the the Zuyder-zee and Overissel, on the E. by Westphalia, on the S. by Brabant and Prussian Guelderland, and on the W. by the province of Utrecht. Its greatest extent from N. to S. is about 47 miles, and nearly the same from E. to W. though, being irregular, not so in every place. The air here is clearer, and consequently more healthy than in Holland and the maritime provinces, as lying much higher. The soil is fruitful in corn and pasture; and large droves of cattle are brought from Denmark to be fattened here. But it is not equally fruitful; for the Veluwe is mostly gravelly, or heathy and barren hills. Zutphen has good pasture, but little corn, as being low and moorish. The inhabitants have in all ages been distinguished for their courage, particularly their cavalry were highly esteemed.

This province is divided into three quarters, Nimeguen, Arnheim, and Zutphen; containing a great number of considerable cities, towns, and villages.

GUELDERLAND, formerly Spanish, now Prussian, or the high quarter of Guelderland, though it does not entirely belong to the King of Prussia. On the W. it is bounded by Dutch Brabant and part of the bishopric of Liege, on the N. by part of the duchy of Cleves, on the E. by part of the same duchy and that of the electorate of Cologne, and on the S. by part of the duchy of Juliers; so that it is entirely divided from Dutch Guelderland. Its greatest length from S. to N. is about 35 miles, and about 24 where broadest. Upon the death of Charles II. of Spain, the Allies conquered it in the war about his succession. By the treaty of Utrecht, the city of Gueldres, Kessel, and Kirkenbeek, &c. were given to the king of Prussia; and by the barrier treaty at Antwerp, in 1715, the emperor ceded Venlo, Fort St Michael, and Fort Stevenswert, &c. to the Dutch.

GELDRE, or GELDRES, a well-fortified town of Prussian Guelderland last-mentioned, on the river Niers, which dividing into two branches, forms the island upon which it stands; it receives that river into its trenches, and lies in the midst of marshes. It has an ancient castle. The French seized it in the beginning of queen Anne's wars; but the Prussians retook it in 1703, after a blockade of 15 months, and a bombardment of 14 days; and, by the peace of Utrecht, it was ceded to the king of Prussia in exchange for the principality of Orange seized by the French, to which the former had a right as heir to king William III. It lies 14 miles N. of Venlo, and 24 S. of Nimeguen. Lat. 51, 41, N. Long. 6, 16, E.

GELMUYDEN, or GENEMUYDEN, anciently Manarmanis Portus, a town of Overissel, on the Zuyder-zee, where the Swart-water or Black-water falls into it. Its ancient castle is now in ruins. It lies seven miles from Zwol, towards the N.

GELNHAUSEN, or GALENHAUSEN, next to Frankfort on the Maine, the second free city of the Wetteraw. It lies in the county of Hanau and landgravate of Hesse, in Germany, on the river Kintz (Kintzig.) Before the German wars it was a considerable place, inhabited by several of the nobility and gentry; and, though reduced, it has still some public structures which make a good appearance. It is of the Protestant religion, and subject to its own magistrates. It lies 12 miles N. of the city of Hanau, and 17 N. W. of Achaffenberg. Lat. 50, 21, N. Long. 9, 5, E.

GEMAAGEDID, a strong town of Africa, near the kingdom of Morocco, seated on a high mountain, with a chief of its own, and a great number of inhabitants.

GEMBLOURS, or GIBLOU, anciently Germiniacum, now Gemblacum, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Orne, and on a steep hill, encompassed with precipices, except towards the E. where a little eminence overlooks it.

Gemblours is considerable for its abbey of St. Hubert, belonging to the Benedictines. The abbot is the first nobleman of Brabant, with the title of count Gemblours. Near this place, in 1578, Don John of Austria defeated the army of the States-General under Antony de Coignies, who lost all his artillery, and was taken prisoner himself. King William, during most part of his wars with France, had his head-quarters in the abbey here. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Namur, and 19 S. E. of Brussels. Lat. 50, 36, N. Long. 4, 36, E.

GEMESIE, (fort of,) in the river of St. John, after the taking of Peutaoguet, in 1674, by 110 men under the command of an Englishman in a Flemish corsair, by surprise, fell easily into our hands soon after.

GEMINIANS, (St.) a town of Italy, in Tuscany, and in the Florentino, seated on a mountain, wherein there is a mine of vitriol. It contains a great many magnificent houses.

GEMMI, (mount,) in the county of Valais, in Switzerland. It begins at the end of the village of Leuck, in the direct road to Berne, and the Leuck-baths. This is a very steep mountain, and being measured by an engineer, appeared to be 10,110 feet high. The ascent is by narrow crooked passages cut out of the rock, and in several parts of it supported by walls or posts laid across, being a difficult and dangerous road.

11 D GEMMIN-

GEMMINGEN, a town of the Lower Palatinate, in Germany. It lies 12 miles W. of Hailbronn, and 30 E. of Philippsburg. Lat. 49, 41, N. Long. 28, 38, E.

GEMUND, an imperial town, and the capital of Rechsberg, on the confines of Hohenrechsberg, in Suabia, in Germany. It stands at the confluence or mouth of several brooks (hence its name,) which empty themselves into the river Rems, the neighbourhood of which is called Remsthal or the valley of Rems, that river falling into the Neckar below Stuttgart. This is a Roman Catholic town, has five churches, two chapels, and several convents, and trades principally in beads, which they export. Here the French general, marshal Villars, encamped in 1707, and raised contributions far and near. It lies 28 miles E. of Stuttgart. Lat. 48, 51, N. Long. 9, 51, E.

GEMUND, the Laciacum of Antoninus, a well built town of Upper Austria, in Germany, at the mouth of the Draun, where it falls into the Gemunder or Draun-lake. It has a considerable trade in salt made in the neighbourhood at Halstadt, being brought hither by the lake, and exported as far as Vienna. It lies 38 miles S. W. of Ens, and 118 of Vienna, in the same direction.

GEMUND, a town of Franconia in Germany, on the river Maine. It lies 24 miles N. of Wurtzburg, being subject to the bishop of this latter name. Lat. 50, 12, N. Long. 9, 56, E.

GEMUND, a town of Juliers in Westphalia, in Germany. It lies on the Roer, 30 miles S. W. of Cologne. Lat. 50, 41, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

GENAP, or GENEPEE, a small town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, on the river Dyle. It stands in a pleasant hunting country, has 26 villages belonging to its jurisdiction, and lies five miles from Nivelles to the E. and 16 from Namur to the N. W.

GENAP, a town in the duchy of Cleves, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It stands on the Niess, where it falls into the Maes opposite Gueldre, 12 miles W. of Cleve city. This place lies well for trade, between Nimeguen and Venlo, but suffered much in the wars. In its river are delicate eels, and a little way from the town, is a strong fort, the works of the town having been demolished by the French when they took the place in 1672. Lat. 51, 51, N. Long. 5, 36, E.

GENESARETH, (lake and land.) The lake, called also the sea of Tiberius, of Kinnereth, Kinneroth, Chinnereth, Cinneroth, the water of Genesar, lake of Genesarit, and sea of Galilee; is by Reland supposed to have borrowed its name from the city of Cinneroth.

GENEVA, (republic of,) in Genevoise, a territory in Savoy, and confines of Switzerland. It is but of small extent, exclusive of the city of its name, not containing above 11 parishes, eight of which are partly under the duke of Savoy; yet it is a considerable ally of the Swiss cantons. The country in general is very fruitful and populous; its villages are large and well-built, in which are several fine houses belonging to the citizens of Geneva. It abounds with good fruit-trees, produces wine both white and red; the former small, but the latter excellent. Wheat is the only corn which they sow, its soil producing it in abundance.

The chapter, and St. Victor's lands, the former, as once belonging to the bishop of Geneva, the latter to the priory in the suburb of that name, have their respective chatellan and court of justice dependent on the republic, from which appeals are brought to that at Carrouge in Savoy, and in the last resort to the parliament of Chamberry. But in spiritual and military matters, together with the other parts of sovereignty, those lands depend entirely on the republic.

The revenue of the republic is about 100,000 crowns; out of which about 300 soldiers, 24 ministers and professors are paid, an arsenal maintained, public officers salaries, pensions, &c.

GENEVA, a city near the confines of France and Switzerland, in E. long. 6, 25. N. lat. 46, 12. called in Latin also Geneva, in German Genf, and in French Geneyé; is situated where the Rhone makes its exit from the lake, 65 miles from Berne, 75 from Lyons, and 106 from Turin. A part of it stands on an island in the Rhone, and part on the banks on both sides, being a handsome well-fortified city, and pretty large. In some of the streets are arched walks or piazzas. The Treille is a most charming place, planted with Linden trees, and commanding a fine prospect of the lake, and of several ranges of mountains and rocks rising behind one another, some covered with vineyards and herbage, and others with snow, with openings betwixt them. Immediately below the city, the Rhone is joined by the Arve. Over the former of these rivers are four bridges. The inhabitants of Geneva are mostly Calvinists. Of the six churches, the cathedral of St. Peter is the principal. The service in some of these churches is in French, in others in Italian, and others in German. The guildhall is a stately free-stone edifice, situated on an eminence, the ascent to which is without any steps, so that a person may not only walk, but ride from the top to the bottom. Here is an arsenal, said to contain arms for 12,000 men; and an university, which has 12 professors, with a very valuable library. As the quantity of corn produced in the territory of the city is not sufficient for the consumption of the inhabitants, the republic has erected large granaries, which always always contain a sufficient to supply the inhabitants two years. The bakers, the inn-keepers, the garrison, and the artificers, employed by the city, are obliged to take what corn they want from these granaries, at a small advance of the prime cost. Besides the revenue arising from hence, the city has other incomes, amounting to about 130,000 dollars, with part of which it maintains a garrison consisting of 800 men.

The environs of the city are extremely pleasant; which, with the goodness of the air and provisions, the mildness of the government, the politeness of the inhabitants, the numbers of foreign gentlemen always residing here, or passing from France, Germany, and other countries, to the N. of the Alps, to Italy, and others lying S. of them, render it a most agreeable place. In all the streets are fountains and canals to supply the inhabitants with water, which is raised by engines from the Rhone. The trade of the city is very considerable, it being a great thoroughfare, and having a variety of manufactures, with a number of industrious and ingenious artificers, particularly in the watchmaking branch. The library belonging to the city is well furnished with excellent books, besides a curious collection of medals and petrifications, and some ancient manuscripts. They are not so rigid in keeping the Sabbath here as the Calvinists in England and Scotland; for they tolerate, and even authorise all manner of manly exercise on Sundays, after divine service; and then it is that the militia are also exercised. The sun rises later here and sets sooner than in most other places of the same latitude, which is owing to the Alps. At the general hospital, besides the city poor, poor travellers are maintained for one day, and then dismissed, with some money in their pockets, to proceed on their journey. As to the government, it is much like that of Zurich and Berne. The number of burghers is about 1500, and the principal magistrates are the four syndics. There are no less than four councils, viz. the general council of the citizens and burghers, the council of 200, that of 60, and that of 25. Of the last, two persons of the same family cannot be members at the same time. A son here who refuses to pay his father's debts, is incapable of holding any office in the state. No marriages are permitted unless both parties are of the Protestant religion. A woman of 40 years of age must not marry a man less than 30; if she exceed 40, her husband must at least be 35; nor must a man above 60 marry a woman who is not at least 30. A widow must not alter her condition in less than six months after her husband's decease. The kings of Britain and France are constantly mentioned in their public prayers here. Before the Reformation, this city was the see of a bishop, who was possessed of the sovereignty thereof at first, jointly with its counts, and afterwards with the dukes of Savoy; but it got rid of both, about the period abovementioned, and entered into alliance with several of the cantons; at present, however, those only with Berne and Zurich continue in force. The king of France always keeps a resident here. So much are the magistracy afraid of opening a door to luxury and licentiousness that no theatre is permitted in the city. During the last two years, this city has been thrown into great disorders, by the people having formed themselves into two parties, one of which had taken possession of the city, but by the interference of France, Sardinia and the Swiss, with some troops, good order has been restored.

GENEVA, (lake,) in the neighbourhood of the city of its name last mentioned, is the greatest in this part of Europe. It is formed partly by the river Rhone, and was anciently called Lacus Lemanus. It is semicircular, the convex part lying towards Switzerland, being 60 miles long, and the other towards Savoy 12 broad. It is pretty narrow at each end, widening towards the middle, between Thonon and Lausanne. In some parts it cannot be fathomed, and is navigable by larger vessels than those commonly seen in rivers. It abounds with perch, large trouts, and other excellent fish, the number of which have been considerably diminished by pikes; and another ravenous fish called montails. This lake decreases in winter, and increases in summer, sometimes to the height of 10 or more feet, on account of the melting of the snows in the mountains. It is hardly ever frozen over; and has the territories of five different states bordering upon it, viz. the kingdom of France, the duchy of Savoy, the canton of Berne, the bishopric of Sion, and the republic of Geneva. Under the lake near Geneva, are several free-stone quarries inclosed with walls, to keep out the rising of the water.

GENGENBACH. See GEGENBACH, a town of Suabia.

GENIS, (St.) a small town of Savoy Proper, in the Upper Division of Italy. It lies on the river Guier le Vis, 14 miles W. of Chambery, and subject to the king of Sardinia. Lat. 45. 38. N. Long. 5. 42. E.

GENOA, a city of Italy, and capital of a republic of the same name, situated in E. long. 8. 31. N. lat. 44. 30. By the Latin authors it is very frequently, though corruptly, called Janua; and its present territories made part of the ancient Liguria. The era of its foundation is not known. In the time of the second Punic war, it was a celebrated emporium; and having declared for the Romans, was plundered and burnt by Mago the Cartha-

Carthaginian. It was afterwards rebuilt by the Romans; and with the rest of Italy continued under their dominion till the decline of the Western empire, in 476. Soon after, it fell under the power of Theodoric the Ostrogoth; who having defeated the usurper Odoacer, became king of Italy. This happened in the year 498; and in a short time, the Goths being almost entirely subdued by Belisarius, the emperor Justinian's general, Genoa was re-annexed to the Roman empire. In 1638, it was plundered and burnt by the Lombards, whose king, Protharis, erected it into a provincial dukedom.

The Lombards continued masters of Genoa till the year 774, when they were conquered by Charles the Great, son to Pepin, king of France. He reduced Liguria to the ancient bounds settled by Augustus, and erected it into a marquissate, appointing his relation Audemar, the first count or marquess. Genoa at this time being distinguished for its wealth and populousness, began to give its name to the whole coast; and continued under the dominion of these counts for about 100 years, till the race of the Pepins became entirely extinct in Italy, and the empire was transferred to the German princes. In the year 935 or 936, while the Genoese forces were absent on some expedition, the Saracens surprised the city, which they plundered and burnt, putting to death a great number of the inhabitants, and carrying others into captivity.

About the year 950, the Franks having lost all authority in Italy, the Genoese began to form themselves into a republic, and to be governed by their own magistrates, who were freely elected, and took the name of Consuls. In order to support their independence, they applied themselves with great assiduity to commerce and navigation; being apprehensive that some of the German emperors, who frequently entered Italy as invaders, might renew their pretensions to their state, they consented to acknowledge Berengarius III. duke of Friuli, who had been elected emperor by a party of Italian nobles.

In 1311, the factions which had for a long time reigned in the city, notwithstanding all its wealth and power, induced the inhabitants to submit themselves for 20 years to the dominion of Henry VII. emperor of Germany. In 1317, a quarrel happened between the families of Spinola and Doria; which came to such a height, that both parties fought in the streets for 24 days without intermission, raised battering engines against each others houses, and filled the city with blood. At last the Spinola quitted the city, and retired to their territories in the Appennine mountains. The civil war continued till the year 1331; when by the mediation of the king of Naples, it was concluded, that all exiles should return to the city, that the republic should be governed by the king's vicar; and all the offices of the state be equally divided between the Guelfs and the Gibellines, the two contending parties.

By this ruinous war, the coast of Genoa, formerly adorned with palaces and vineyards, was now reduced to the appearance of a barren waste. So great was the general desolation, that according to Petrarch, the spectators who sailed along were struck with astonishment and horror.

In 1336, both parties, suspending their mutual animosities, sent two fleets of 20 galleys each, into the German ocean, to the assistance of the king of France, who was engaged in a war with Edward III. king of England. This naval expedition proved the cause of a most remarkable revolution in the Genoese government. The sailors of the fleet thinking themselves injured by their officers, whom they accused of defrauding them of their pay, proceeded to an open mutiny, and, having expelled the admiral and other commanders, seized the galleys. The king of France being chosen arbitrator, decided in favour of the officers, and imprisoned 16 of the chiefs of the mutineers. Upon this several of the sailors left the fleet, and returned to Genoa, where they went round the coasts repeating their mutinous complaints, which were greatly hearkened to, upon a false report that the mutineers who had been imprisoned were broke upon the wheel. The factitious spirit increased, and at last the Genoese insisted in a tumultuous manner, for having an abbot of their own choosing, and 20 of the people with the consent of the captains of the republic assembled for that purpose. While the mob were impatiently expecting their decision, a mechanic, generally accounted a fool, mounted a wooden bench, and called out that one Simon Bucanigree should be chosen abbot. This being instantly echoed by the populace, he was first declared abbot, then lord, and at last duke of Genoa.

This new expedient did not at all answer the purpose. The dissensions continued as violent as ever, notwithstanding the power of the new magistrates; and by these perpetual divisions, the republic was so much weakened, that in 1390, the king of France was declared lord of Genoa. Under the French government, however, they soon became exceedingly impatient; and in 1422, the duke of Milan obtained the sovereignty. With this situation they were equally displeased, and therefore revolted in 1436. Twenty-two years after, finding themselves pressed by a powerful fleet and army sent by Alphonso, king of Naples, they again conferred the sovereignty of their state upon the king of France. In 1460, they revolted from the French, and four years after, put themselves again under the protection of the duke of Milan; from whom they revolted in 1478. He was again declared sovereign of the republic in 1488, and 11 years after, the city and territories of Genoa were conquered by Lewis XII. of France.

The almost unparalleled fickleness of the Genoese disposition, was not to be corrected by this misfortune. They revolted in 1506, but next year were again subdued by Lewis. Six years after they again revolted, and in 1516, the city was taken and plundered by the Spaniards. In 1528, Andrew Doria, a Genoese admiral in the service of the French, undertook to rescue his country from the dominion of foreign princes, and restore it to its liberty. Knowing well the fickle disposition of his countrymen, he took all occasions of exciting discontents among them against the government. He persuaded them, that the French (who had again obtained the sovereignty) had left them only a shadow of liberty, while they pretended to protect them from their enemies. To the nobility he represented the disgrace of suffering the government to be vested in the hands of foreigners less worthy of authority than themselves. Thus he soon raised a strong faction, and formed his plan; for the execution of which he took the most proper time, namely, when almost three-fourths of the French garrison had been carried off by the plague. He advanced with 500 men; and his friends having opened the gates of the city to him, he seized the principal posts, and thus became master of it without drawing his sword. The garrison retired to the forts, where they soon after capitulated, and being driven out of the city, Doria re-established the ancient form of government.

The republic hath since continued to preserve her liberty, though greatly fallen from her ancient splendor, and is now become a very inconsiderable state. In 1684, the Genoese had the misfortune to fall under the resentment of Lewis XIV. at which time the city was almost destroyed by a formidable bombardment. In the year 1688, it was bombarded by admiral Byng, and forced to capitulate; but there were at that time no views of making a permanent conquest of the city. In 1730, the island of Corsica revolted from the Genoese, and could never afterwards be reduced by them.

The Genoese territories extend along that part of the Mediterranean sea, commonly called the Gulph of Genoa, about 152 miles; but their breadth is very unequal, being from eight to about 20 miles. Where they are not bounded by the sea, the following states and countries, taking them from W. to E. are their boundaries, viz. Piemont, Montferat, Milan, Placentia, Parma, the dukedom of Tuscany, and the republic of Lucca. This tract, though a great part of it is mountainous, and some of that barren enough, yet produces plenty of excellent fruit, good pasture, wood, garden stuff, and mulberry-trees, with some wine and oil, but little corn. What they want of the last, they have either from Lombardy, Sicily, or Naples.

Genoa city stands on the coast of the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of a little gulph, partly on the flat, and partly on the declivity, of a pleasant hill; in consequence of which, it appears to great advantage from the sea. It is defended on the land-side by a double wall, which in circumference is about 10 Italian miles. The churches, the palaces of the nobility, are all of the most magnificent structure. The strada Nuova and strada Balbi are with justice called a collection of palaces. The cathedral is of the Gothic order, cased with black and white marble. The fronts of many palaces, amongst others those of Doria, Balbi, Durazzo, Brignoletti, are of marble. The most remarkable churches are the Annunciata, St. Cyre, or the Theatins, St. Philip, the Jesuits, St. Ambrose, and that of Carignano. In the Albergo there is a fine relief by Michael Angelo, of the Virgin supporting a dead Christ; and the Assumption of the Virgin in white marble, by Puget, is a master-piece of sculpture.

The palace where the doge resides, and where the great and little council, and the two colleges of the procuratori and governatori assemble, is a large stone building in the center of the city; but it contains some fine paintings in fresco, two statues of Andrew and John Doria in white marble; and an arsenal, in which are said to be arms for 34,000 men, with a shield, containing 120 pistol barrels, and 33 coats of mail, which, it is pretended, were worn by as many Genoese heroes in a croisade. In the cathedral is a dish made of a single emerald. All the inhabitants here, except the principal ladies, who are carried in chairs, walk on foot, on account of the narrowness or steepness of the streets. The fortifications of the city, towards the sea, are remarkably strong. There are two fine stone bridges over the rivers Bonzevera and Bisagno, the first whereof washes the W. and the other the E. side of the city, within which there is also a surprising stone bridge joining two hills. The harbour, though large, is far from being safe; but no care or expence have been spared to render it as safe and commodious as possible. The wind to which it is most exposed is that called Labeccio, or the S. W. The place where the republic's galleys lie, is called called the Darsena, where are a great number of Turkish slaves. On a rock, on the W. side of the harbour, is the fanal or light-house, a high tower, on the top of which is a lantern, containing 36 lamps. The trade of Genoa is chiefly in velvets, damasks, plush, and other silks, brocades, lace, gloves, sweetmeats, fruit, oil, Parmesan cheese, anchovies, medicinal drugs from the Levant; but the badness of the harbour, and the high price of commodities, greatly check its commerce. In 1751, Genoa was declared a free port for 10 years, under certain restrictions; in that called Porto Franco, any merchant may have a warehouse, and import or export goods duty free; but such as are disposed of in the city, or on the continent, are taxed pretty high. The nobility are allowed to trade in the wholesale way; to carry on velvet, silk, and cloth manufactures; and to have shares in merchant-ships: and some of them, as the Palavacini, are actually the greatest merchants in Genoa. Another very profitable article of trade carried on by them is banking, and dealing in bills of exchange. A new academy of painting, sculpture, civil and military architecture, was instituted here in 1751. One may walk the streets of Genoa in the night with the greatest safety, which is more than can be said of many cities in Italy. Excessive splendor and luxury are, in several respects, restrained by salutary laws. No beggars are permitted to ask alms in Genoa, and the inns are better than those at Turin. When a single person is buried, a kind of garland of all sorts of artificial flowers is placed on the coffin. The Genoese in general are esteemed crafty, industrious, and inured to labour above the other Italians.

The legislative authority of Genoa is lodged in the great senate, consisting of signiors, or the doge and twelve other members, with 400 noblemen and principal citizens annually elected. All matters of state are transacted by the signiors, the members of which hold their places for two years, assisted by some other councils; and four parts in five of the senate must agree in passing any thing into a law. The doge is obliged to reside in the public palace, the two years he enjoys his office, with two of the signiory and their families; and at the expiration of his time he retires to his own house for eight days, when his administration is either approved or condemned: and in the latter case he is proceeded against as a criminal. At the election of the doge a crown of gold is placed on his head, and a sceptre in his hand, as king of Corsica: he is attended with life-guards, is clothed in crimson velvet, and styled Most Serene, the senators Excellencies, and the nobility illustrious.

GEORGE's, (St.) a small island in the territory of Venice, lying to the S. of that capital. In it there is a Benedictine monastery, whose church is one of the finest in Italy, and is embellished with a great number of fine pictures.

GEORGE's, (St.) one of the Azores, or Western Islands. It is inhabited by about 5000 persons, who cultivate much wheat.

GEORGE-TOWN district, in S. Carolina, includes all places between Santee river, the sea, and the line which divides the parishes of St. Mark and Prince Frederick, which is continued in the same course across Pedee river to the N. Carolina boundary.

GEORGE-TOWN, a sea-port of the above district, at the mouth of the Pedee river, and has a good harbour of its own name, where resides a collector, &c. to receive the duties; at the mouth of which is Craven Island.

GEORGE's-TOWN, (St.) a town in New-castle county, on the Delaware, in Pennsylvania, nine miles N. of Noxon, and 10 S. W. of New-castle.

GEORGE's-TOWN, (St.) the capital of the island of Grenada, in the West Indies. It began to be constructed since the peace of 1762, and was destroyed in 1771, by a dreadful fire, and on November 1, 1775, again suffered the like misfortune, when, as the houses, which were become very numerous, were built mostly of wood, they were all destroyed to the loss of above 500,000l.

GEORGE's RIVER, (St.) in the county of Lincoln, in the province of New Hampshire, in New England. It is two leagues S. W. from Penobscot-bay, and is a mile wide at the mouth, on which is a fort of the same name, two miles above which the navigation is obstructed by several falls.

GEORGE's SOUND, (King) the western extremity of California, where captain Cook repaired his vessel in his discoveries to the N. of America, in the Pacific ocean. It lies in lat. 50, 0, N. long. 133, 0, E. Here the inhabitants were no strangers to the use of iron and other metals, but how they procured it is unknown.

GEORGE's ISLANDS, (King) are two islands in the South sea, lying in W. long. 144, 56, S. lat. 14, 28. They were first discovered by commodore Byron in 1765, and have since been visited by captain Cook in 1774. Commodore Byron's people had an encounter with the inhabitants, which proved fatal to some of the natives; but captain Cook was more fortunate. A lieutenant and two boats well armed were sent on shore by captain Cook, and landed without opposition. As soon as the gentlemen landed, the islanders embraced them by touching noses, a mode of civility used in New Zealand, which is 900 leagues distant, and the only place besides this where the custom custom has been observed to prevail. Notwithstanding this ceremony, however, very little real friendship seemed to take place on the part of the islanders. They crowded about the boats as the people were stepping into them, and seemed in doubt whether they should detain them or let them go; at last, however, not thinking themselves sufficiently strong, they seemed contented with their departure, and assisted them in pushing off their boats; but some of the most turbulent threw stones into the water, which fell very near them, and all seemed to glory that they had, as it were, driven them off. The British, however, brought off five dogs of a white colour with fine long hair, with which the island seemed to be plentifully supplied. These they purchased with small nails, and some ripe bananas which had been brought from the Marquesas. On this island Mr. Forester found a kind of scurvy-grass, which the natives informed him they were wont to bruise and mix with shell-fish; after which, they threw it into the sea whenever they perceived a shoal of fish. This preparation intoxicates them for some time; and thus they are caught on the surface of the water without any other trouble than that of taking them out. The name of this plant among the natives is a now. The largest island, which they call Tiookea, is something of an oval shape, and about 10 leagues in circuit, the other island, which lies two leagues to the westward of Tiookea, is four leagues long from N. E. to S. W. and from five to three miles long. The soil of both is extremely scanty; the foundation consists of coral, very little elevated above the surface of the water. Commodore Byron saw on a lake in this island some vessels, one of which had two masts, rigged with cordage.

GEORGE DEL MINA, (St.) the capital of the Dutch settlements on the Gold coasts of Guinea, situated seven or eight miles W. of Cape-coast castle, the capital of the British settlements there. W. long. 6, 5. and N. lat. 5, 0.

GEORGE, (St.) a fort and town of Asia, in the peninsula on this side the Ganges, and on the coast of Coromandel, belonging to the English; it is otherwise called Madras, and by the natives Chili-patam. It fronts the sea, and has a salt-water river on its back-side, which hinders the fresh-water springs from coming near the town, so that they have no good water within a mile of them. In the rainy seasons it is incommoded by inundations; and from April to September it is so scorching hot, that if the sea-breezes did not cool the air, there would be no living there. There are two towns, one of which is called the White Town, which is walled round, and has several bulwarks and bastions to defend it: it is 400 paces long, and 150 broad, and is divided into regular streets. Here are two churches, one for the Protestants, and the other for the Papists; as also a good hospital, a town-hall, and a prison for debtors. They are a corporation, and have a mayor and aldermen, with other proper officers. The black town is inhabited by Gentoos, Mahometans, and Portuguese and Armenian Christians, and each religion have their temples and churches. This, as well as the White Town, is ruled by the English governor and his council. The diamond mines are but a week's journey from this place, which renders them pretty plentiful, but there are no large ones since that great diamond was procured by governor Pitt. This colony produces very little of its own growth or manufacture for foreign markets, and the trade is in the hands of the Armenians and Gentoos. The chief things the British deal in, besides diamonds, are calicoes, chintz, muslins, and the like. This colony may consist of 80,000 inhabitants in the towns and villages, and there are generally 400 or 500 Europeans. Their rice is brought by sea to Gangam and Orix, their wheat from Surat and Bengal, and their fire-wood from the island of Diu: so that an enemy, with a superior force at sea, may easily distress them. The houses of the White Town are built with brick, and have lofty rooms and flat roofs; but the Black Town consists chiefly of thatched cottages. The military power is lodged in the governor and council, who are also the last resort in civil causes. The company have two chaplains, who officiate by turns, and have each 100*l.* a year, besides the advantages of trade. They never attempt to make proselytes, but leave that to the Popish missionaries. The salaries of the company's writers are very small: but, if they have any fortune of their own, they may make it up by trade, which must generally be the case, for they commonly grow rich. It was taken by the French in 1746, who restored it at the peace of Aix la Chapelle.

GEORGE's, (St.) the largest of the Bermuda or Somer Islands. W. long. 65, 10. N. lat. 32, 30.

GEORGIA, a country of Asia, subject to the Turks. It is bounded on the N. by Circassia, on the E. by Daghestan and Shirvan, on the S. by Armenia, and on the W. by the Euxine or Black sea, comprehending the greatest part of the ancient Colchis, Iberia, and Albania. About the etymon of the name of this country, authors are not agreed. The most probable opinion is, that it is a corruption or softening of Kurgia, from the river Kur; whence also, it is supposed, that the inhabitants are called by the Persians indifferently Georgi, Gurgi, and Kurgi; and the country Kurgistan, gistan and Gurgistan. It is divided by a ridge of mountains into Eastern and Western; the former of which is again subdivided into the kingdoms of Caket, Carduel or Carthuel, and Goguettia; and the latter into the provinces of Abcassia, Mireta, or Imaretta, and Guriel. Another division is into Georgia Proper, Abcessia, and Mingrelia.

"Georgia, (says Sir John Chardin) is as fertile a country as can be seen; the bread is as good there as in any part of the world, the fruit of an exquisite flavour, and of different sorts: no place in Europe yields better pears and apples, and no place in Asia better pomegranates. The country abounds with cattle, venison, and wild-fowl, of all sorts; the river Kuris is well stocked with fish; and the wine is so rich, that the king of Persia has always some of it for his own table. The inhabitants are robust, valiant, and of a jovial temper, great lovers of wine, and esteemed very trusty and faithful, endowed with good natural parts, but, for want of education, very vicious. The women are generally so fair and comely, that the wives and concubines of the king of Persia and his court are, for the most part, Georgian women. Nature has adorned them with graces no where else to be met with; it is impossible to see them without loving them: they are of a good size, clean limbed and well shaped."

Another traveller, however, of no mean character, thus expresses himself with respect to the women: "As to the Georgian women, they did not at all surprise us, for we expected to find them perfect beauties. They are, indeed, no way disagreeable, and may be counted beauties, if compared with the Curdes. They have an air of health that is pleasing enough; but, after all, they are neither so handsome nor so well shaped as is reported. Those who live in the towns have nothing extraordinary, more than the others; so that I may, I think, venture to contradict the accounts that have been given of them by most travellers."

Georgia abounds with woods and mountains, intermixed with a great number of beautiful plains.

The only rivers of note in this country are, the Cyrus, Cyrrus, the Corus or Kur, and the Aragus. The first springs from the Moschian mountains, which separate Colchis from Armenia, waters the country now called Mogan, and, after receiving into its channel the Aragus and Araxes, falls by one mouth into the Caspian sea. This river is navigable the greatest part of its course. The Aragus springs from the mountains that separate Iberia from Colchis, and falls into the Cyrus.

Iberia, or Georgia, is tributary or subject either to the Porte or the king of Persia, and known to the Persians by the name of Gurgistan, that is, "the land of the Georgians; for tan is an ancient Celtic word, signifying a country, and still in use among the eastern nations, as appears from the modern names of Curdestan, Indostan, &c. that is, the country of the Curdes, of the Indians, &c.

The whole country of Georgia is but thinly inhabited, and has but very few cities in proportion to its extent and fertility; which is doubtless in a great measure owing to the barbarous and unnatural traffic carried on here in boys and girls, parents selling their children, masters their servants, and lords their vassals and tenants. Every one, in short, trades in the males and females he is master of, and disposes of them to the Turks and Persians, who employ them in their armies and seraglios, as slaves, mutes, eunuchs, soldiers, statesmen, and concubines, according to their capacities, and the favour they have obtained with their masters.

This country formerly abounded with great cities, as appears not only from its history, but from the ruins of many of them still visible, which shew that they must have been very large, opulent, and magnificently built. These were all destroyed by the inundations of northern barbarians from mount Caucasus, as the Alans, Huns, Suevi, and some others, so much noted in history for their strength, courage, and conquests.

The air of Georgia is serene, dry, and healthful; but very cold in winter, and hot in summer.

The fine weather commonly begins about May, and lasts till November. But the lands want a good deal of watering to make them produce a plentiful crop; when they yield all sorts of grain, fruit, and pulse, in abundance, which sell at so cheap a rate that the people want for nothing. The cattle, both small and great, are fat and good, and in great numbers; but the common people live mostly on swine's flesh, which is every where excellent, and, by their own account, wholesome and of easy digestion. The river Kur, as well as the Caspian sea, which lies E. of Georgia, supplies it with plenty and variety of fish.

The mountains of Caucasus, that lie partly in this country, are known at present to the inhabitants by the names of Cochis and Cochias, which are, without doubt, a corruption of the ancient. The Arabs call them the Mountains of Raf.

The inhabitants are civil enough to strangers, allowing them to live and trade as they please, and to profess what religion they have a mind: hence people of various nations are seen here, as Turks, Armenians, Persians, Jews, Greeks, Indians, Tartars, Russians, and other Europeans. But the Armenians are the most numerous, and, by carrying on the greatest part of the trade, are also also the richest; for which reason the Georgians hate and despise them, regarding them much in the same light as the Europeans do the Jews. The Georgians wear four caps on their heads, and a kind of long vest, open before, but which may be buttoned at pleasure; their breeches and undergarments are like those of the Persians, as is the entire dress of the women.

Their houses, especially those of the better sort, are also after the model of those of Persia, as well as all their public buildings: and they may afford to have them built after the best manner, having not only stone, wood plaster, lime, and all other materials, in the greatest plenty and cheapness; but also can have the most laborious work done by their own vassals, over whom they have such an absolute power, that they can keep them employed whole months together, without allowing them either wages or food.

Iberia, or Georgia, according to Josephus, was first peopled by Tubal, the brother of Gomer and Magog. His opinion is confirmed by the Septuagint; for Meshech and Tubal are by these interpreters rendered Moschi and Iberians. We know little of the history of the country till the reign of Mithridates, when their king, named Artocis, siding with that prince against Lucullus, and afterwards against Pompey, was defeated by the latter, with great slaughter; but afterwards obtained a peace upon delivering up his sons as hostages. Little notice is taken of the succeeding kings by the ancient historians. They were probably tributary to the Romans till that empire was overturned, when this, with the other countries in Asia bordering on it, fell successively under the power of the Saracens and Turks. A powerful prince of Georgia, named Heraclius, has lately made a great noise, and a considerable progress in his endeavours to shake off the Turkish yoke, having, according to advices from the east, several times defeated the Ottoman troops: but it seems either his former good fortune forsook him, or an accommodation took place; for all the intelligence from that part of the world, for some time past, hath been entirely silent with regard to him.

The capital of the country is Teflis; for an account of which, see that article.

GEORGIA, (Southern) the most southern land ever discovered, (see AMERICA) situated in lat. 55, 0 S. long. 33, 30, W. Captain Cook, in his return from the South sea in 1775, found out an excellent harbour, but full of ice, and the land very mountainous.

GEORGIA, a large tract of land between Carolina and Florida. It is separated from South Carolina by the river Savannah on the N. has the Atlantic ocean on the E. is bounded by the Mississippi on the W. and parted from the Floridas on the S. Its extent is 170 miles from N. to S. near the sea, but widens in the remoter parts to above 150. It is divided into the following counties, viz. Savannah, which contains the capital towns of Savannah and Ebenezer; Halifax, has the town of Queensborough; Augusta, which has Augusta and Wrightsborough; and Southern, which has Sunbury, a port of entry, and Frederica.

George II. was pleased to grant a charter, dated the 9th of June, 1732, constituting a corporation under the name of trustees for establishing a colony in Georgia; which included all that country situated in South Carolina, which lies from the most northern stream of the river Savannah, along the coast, to the most southern stream of the Altamaha, and W. from the sources of the said rivers, respectively in direct lines, as far as the south or Pacific sea. Georgia is but indifferently peopled, though it is now upwards of 40 years since its first settlement. Not one of our colonies was of so slow a growth, though none had so much of the attention of the government, or of the people in general, or raised so great expectations in the beginning. They export some corn and lumber to the West Indies; they raise some rice, and of late have gone with success into indigo.

After passing the bars, ships meet with a secure and commodious harbour in the mouth of the Savannah river; and to the S. of it is a still more capacious road, called Teky sound, where a large fleet may anchor in between 10 and 14 fathoms water, being land-locked, and having a safe entrance over the bar. The tide of flood generally rises on this coast to seven feet.

This country produces Indian corn, as also wheat, oats, and barley, of which the two last grains grow best. Very good wheat is likewise reaped in May; and they mow the grass in June. Here are potatoes, pumpkins, water and musk melons, cucumbers, all sorts of English green peas, (which, with proper care and culture, may be had almost the whole year round), and garden-beans, but the Windsor sort will not flourish here; Indian peas, all sorts of salading the year round, and all sorts of sweet herbs and pot-herbs. Here are nectarines, plums, and peaches; which three, especially the last, are almost as common as apple-trees are in Herefordshire. The plums are ripe the beginning of May; peaches and nectarines the latter end of June. Here are no hazel-nuts, but chincapins very sweet and good; wild grapes in abundance, which are ripe in June; as also four or five sorts of good wind-berries; presimmins, much like our medlars, wild cherries, that grow in sprays like currants, and are not much larger, but taste like very a small black cherry, and are ripe in May. Here are a few English cherries in the gardens and orchards; also apple, pear, and a few apricot trees: many of the apple-trees bear twice a year; but the latter crop is small. Here are great quantities of white mulberry-trees, the fruit of which is not to compare with those of England, though the leaves are the best food for the silk-worms. Olives flourish here in the greatest perfection; and so do oranges, especially in the S. part of the province, where an orange-tree has been known, in seven years, to rise 15 feet from the root to the branches. The chief timber-trees are, pines in abundance, six or seven species of oak, hickory, black walnut, cedar, white and black cypress, white and red laurels, bays, myrtle, of whose berries they make candles; sassafras, an infusion of which makes good drink; beech trees, and many others which have no particular name. In some places here the land is as good as any in England, were there but hands sufficient to cultivate it.

This country affords a great deal of wild game, particularly in winter, from November to March, such as wild geese, ducks, teals, and widgeons, wild turkies, from 20 to 30 pounds weight; turtle-doves in abundance, curlews, sand-birds, wood-cocks, and partridges, but much smaller than in England; deer, a creature between a rabbit and a hare, which is very good eating; and, when it is very cold weather in the northern parts of America, here are vast flights of wild pigeons, which are very easy to shoot. The chief game here in the summer season is deer and ducks. Here are many tigers, but small; and bears, the flesh of whose cubs eats like that of young pigs. Here are wild cattle, and wolves, that often run away with the calves of the tame ones. In the woods are abundance of snakes, but none venomous except the rattle-snake. In the rivers are abundance of sharks and alligators. Here is plenty of fish. With regard to shell-fish, here are oysters innumerable, but not so good as the English; crabs, clams, muscles, conchs, and very large prawns.

Of all manufactures, none seems so practicable, and withal so beneficial here, as the raising of silk, the soil of Georgia being extremely proper for the culture of mulberry-trees, and the climate no less agreeable to silk-worms. The principal rivers are the Savannah, Altamaha, or George and St. Mary's in Georgia, the last dividing it from Florida; and its chief harbours are the mouths of the rivers Savannah and Altamaha.

The following account of the exports for 23 years, shews the progress of the trade of the province: In the first column in the year, the second

1771	185	106,387
1772	217	121,677

Of the exports in 1772, about 20,000 l. was from Sunbury, and the rest from Savannah.

The number of white inhabitants is very uncertain. The number of negroes and other slaves is supposed to be 14,000; that of free negroes, mulattoes, &c. very inconsiderable.

The sum granted in 1773, to defray the expenses of government for the three preceding years, was 517 l. 15s. 10 d. to raise which, every 100 acres of land, and every slave, was taxed 2s. 6d. goods imported, 7s. 6d. per cent. which are the principal articles; other smaller articles were taxed in proportion.

The principal town of Georgia is Savannah; which see.

In 1775, this province joined the confederate provinces which had revolted from Britain; but in 1778 was subdued by the British troops, in whose possession it remained till 1782, when it was abandoned to the Provincials.

GERAR, a place frequently mentioned in the history of Abraham, was a Philistine city, venerable as being the seat of their first kings; but its exact situation is not determined.

GERAW, a town of Hesse-Darmstadt, in Germany. It lies 12 N. W. of Darmstadt. Lat. 49, 56, N. Long. 8, 21, E.

GERÆSTUS, in Eubœa, between the two promontories of Geræstus and Caphareus, is by Homer and Livy spoken of not as a city, but as a famous famous haven. In the time of Stephanus it was a village.

GERBEROY, in Latin, Gerboredum, or Gerberacum, a town of Beauvais, in the Isle of France. It stands on a high mountain. The little river Terrain, at the bottom of this place, is said never to freeze, and in summer its water is so cold, that no body bathes in it. Here is a collegiate church. The bishop of Beauvais being temporal lord of this town and territory, is styled, Vidame de Gerberoy. It lies between four and five leagues from Beauvais, to the W.

GERBES, or GERBI, or ZERBI, an island of Africa, in the kingdom of Tunis, on the coast of Barbary, in the Mediterranean sea. It bears no corn but barley; though there are large quantities of figs, olives, and grapes, which, when dried, are raisins, of which their principal trade consists. It depends on the bashaw of Tripoli. Long. 11, 30, E. Lat. 34, 10, N.

GERDANEN, a small town of Rastenburg Circle, in the kingdom of Prussia. It lies on the river Omet. Here are two castles, one of which is a modern and stately seat. In a lake near it, is a swimming island or grassy plat, on which 100 head of cattle may graze, driven by the wind from one side to the other, and called Gerdanen-calendar. Lat. 53, 10, N. Long. 22, 30, E.

GERGENTI, anciently, Agragas, or Agrigentum, a town lying on the S. shore of Val di Mazara, in Sicily. It is the see of a bishop, and defended with a castle so strong by nature, that there is no access to it but at one place. The territory about it is rich, and produces great quantities of corn, of which is great traffic by the river and its port, which last lies about five miles west of it. Lat. 37, 31, N. Long. 22, 30, E.

GERMA, a city in the Hellespont, which was destroyed by that most dreadful earthquake, which at the same time utterly ruined Nice, anno domini, 368.

GERMACH, a village in the shire of Elgin, and N. of Scotland, at the mouth of the river Spey, (not Loffy,) with a salmon-fishery, where between 80 and 90 last of fish are pickled and exported annually, being caught in a few months in summer, and within a mile above the issue of the river, principally by means of long drag-nets and flat-bottomed boats, called cobbles (not boats covered with hides.) The salmon here are a very large, and of a fat sort.

This river is of such a depth, particularly at high-water, that vessels of above 100 tons can lie off Germach; though the mouth of the river is not very safe, the sand shifting frequently on account of the rapidity of the stream, and a sensible descent, especially when the land-floods happen; so that in coming out vessels sometimes are obliged to cut their cable. Germach lies 12 miles E. of Elgin.

GERMAIN-LAVAL, (St.) a town of France. in Forez, seated in a territory fertile in excellent wines; 225 miles S. E. of Paris. Long. 3, 57, E. Lat. 45, 50, N.

GERMAIN EN LAYE, (St.) a populous town of the Isle of France, on the river Seine. Here is one of the capital royal palaces, but an irregular structure, founded by king Francis I. It was enlarged by Henry IV. Lewis XIII. and Lewis XIV. where the latter was born.

It was the usual residence of the unfortunate king James II. of England, during his exile, and where he breathed his last. Here also is his monument. It lies 16 miles N. W. of Paris. Lat. 49, 12, N. Long. 2, 17, E.

GERMANS, (St.) Cornwall, 223 miles from London, between Saltash and Leskeard, on the little river Liver, abounding with oysters. Though once a bishop's see, removed hither from Bodmin, and from hence to Crediton, and thence to Exeter, it is now a decayed village; yet it has, ever since the 5th of queen Elizabeth sent two members to Parliament, has a market, though a small one, on Friday, and fairs May 28, and August 1. The chief magistrate, who is called the mayor, or portreeve, is bailiff also of the borough, and may make any house in it the prison of the person whom he arrests. He is chosen about Michaelmas, at the court-leet of the lord of the manor, by a jury impannelled for the purpose. The ruins of the episcopal palace are yet visible at a farm-house at Cuttenbeck, one mile and a half from the town, and in the church, which is large and handsome, there are still an episcopal chair (which is for the bishop of Exeter's suffragan) and the stalls of the prebends.

The parish, which is the largest in Cornwall, is 20 miles in compass including no less than 17 villages; and it is supposed to have more gentlemen's seats and lordships than any other parish in England. Here was formerly a priory at a place fronting the river, now called Port-Elliot. Here is a public school. The rectory of its church is held by lease, for 21 years, of the dean and chapter of Windfor. The members of parliament are chose by all the householders who have lived a year within the borough, which contains about 60 houses near the church, the rest of the parish being without the borough. The town stands on a rising ground, in the form of an amphitheatre; but the houses are meanly built and irregular, as is the rock which is their basis.

GERMANCOPOLIS, capital of Isauria, was in the 5th century an episcopal see.

GERMANO, (St.) a town of Italy in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra-di-Lavoro; seated at the foot of Mount Cassano, and belongs to an abbey on the top of that mount. Long. 13, 53. E. Lat. 41, 33. N.

GERMAN-TOWN, in Philadelphia county, Pennsylvania, N. America, the most considerable place in it, next to the city of Philadelphia; consists chiefly of one street, two miles in length. At this place the Provincials attacked the kings troops in 1777, but were defeated. It is a corporation of High and Low Dutch, having between 2 and 300 houses, with peach-trees planted before their doors. It is a pleasant town, and well-cleared of trees.

GERMANY, (empire of,) a considerable country, of large extent, and the scene of many great actions, whose affairs are interwoven with those of every nation in Europe. It anciently extended N. as far as the Northern ocean; so that Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, were included; and S. it was bounded by the Danube; so that Austria, Bavaria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, &c. now reckoned part of it, were excluded, as well as Alsace, part of the Palatinate and spiritual electorates, the Rhine being reckoned by Ptolemy and other ancient writers the western boundary. These last, indeed, together with Lorrain and the neighbouring countries, were afterwards possessed by Germans; and being conquered by the Romans, were distinguished by them into Germania Prima, and Germania Secunda; but Lorrain and Alsace, &c. now belong to France.

At present Germany is bounded on the W. by the dominions of France and the Low Countries, from which it is separated by the rivers Rhine, Moselle, and Maese; on the E. by Poland and Hungary, including Bohemia; on the N. by Denmark and the Baltic sea; and on the S. by Switzerland, the dominions of the State of Venice and the Alps, which divide it from Italy. It lies between lat. 45 deg. 12 min. and 55 deg. N. and between long. 5 and 19 deg. 45 min. being from N. to S. that is, from Stralsund in Pomerania, to the frontiers of Carniola and Istria, 600 English miles; and in breadth, from the town of Spa in the W. to the confines of Poland in the E. about 500. It is said to be three times and a half larger than England, a fifth bigger than France, and as large as Poland or Sweden.

The divisions of Germany, as laid down even by modern writers, are various and uncertain. I shall therefore stick to those that are most generally received. Germany formerly was divided into the Upper or Southern, and the Lower or Northern.

G E

The emperor Maximilian, predecessor and grandfather to the emperor Charles V. divided it into 10 great circles; and the division was confirmed in the diet of Nuremberg, in 1552; but the circle of Burgundy, or the Seventeen Provinces of the Low Countries, being now detached from the empire, we are to confine ourselves to nine of those Divisions, as they now subsist: whereof three are in the North, three in the Middle, and three in the South.

The northern circles,	—	{ Upper Saxony, Lower Saxony, Westphalia.
The circles in the middle,	—	{ Upper Rhine, Lower Rhine, Franconia.
The southern circles,	—	{ Austria, Bavaria, Suabia.

The climate of Germany, as in all large tracts of country, differs greatly, not only on account of the situation, north, east, south, and west; but according to the improvement of the soil, which has a vast effect upon the climate. The most mild and settled weather is found in the middle of the country, at an equal distance from the sea and the Alps. In the N. it is sharp; but towards the S. it is more temperate.

The soil of Germany is not improved to the full by culture, and therefore in many places it is bare and sterile, though in others it is surprisingly fruitful. Agriculture has of late years made an extraordinary progress, which must necessarily change the most barren parts of Germany greatly to their advantage. The seasons vary as much as the soil. In the S. and W. parts they are more regular than those that lie near the sea, or that abound with lakes and rivers. The N. winds and the E. blasts are unfavourable to vegetation. Upon the whole, there is no great difference between the seasons of Germany and those of Great Britain.

The chief mountains of Germany are the Alps, which divide it from Italy, and those which separate Saxony, Bavaria, and Moravia from Bohemia. Great part of Germany, however, may be called a spacious plain, interspersed here and there with agreeable hills, which only tend to heighten the beauty of the scene.

The vast passion the Germans have for hunting the wild boar, is the reason why perhaps there are more woods and chaces yet standing in Germany than in most other countries. The Hercynian forest, which in Cæsar's time was nine days journey in length, and six in breadth, is now cut down in many places, or parcelled out into woods, which go by particular names. Most of the woods are pine, fir, oak, and beech. There is a vast number of forests of less note in every part of the country; almost every count, baron, or gentleman, having a chace or park adorned with pleasure-houses, and well stocked with game, viz. deer, of which there are seven or eight sorts, as roebucks, stags, &c. of all sizes and colours, and many of vast growth; plenty of hares, rabbits, foxes, bears, wolves, and boars. They abound so much also with wild-fowl, that in many places the peasants have them and venison for their ordinary food.

No country can boast a greater variety of noble large rivers than Germany. At their head stands the Danube or Donaw, so called from the swiftness of the current, and which some pretend to be naturally the finest river in the world. From Vienna to Belgrade, it is so broad, that in the wars between the Turks and Christians, ships of war have been engaged on it; and its conveniency for carriage to all the countries through which it passes is inconceivable. The Danube, however, contains a vast number of cataraets and whirlpools; its stream is rapid, and its course, without reckoning turnings or windings, is computed to be 1620 miles. The other principal rivers are the Rhine, Elbe, Oder, Weser, Moselle, Spree, Penne, Grus, Mein, and Saar.

The chief lakes of Germany, not to mention many inferior ones, are those of Constance and Bregents. Besides these are the Chiemsee, or the lake of Bavaria; and the Zecknitzer-see, in the duchy of Carniola, whose waters often run off and return again in an extraordinary manner.

Besides those lakes and rivers, in some of which are found pearls, Germany contains large noxious bodies of standing water, which are next to pestilential, and afflict the neighbouring natives with many deplorable disorders.

As to mineral waters and baths, Germany is said to contain more of those than all Europe besides. All Europe has heard of the Spa waters, and those of Pyrmont. Those of Aix la Chapelle are still more noted. They are divided into the emperor's bath, and the little bath; and the springs of both are so hot, that they let them cool 10 or 12 hours before they use them. Each of those, and many other waters, have their partizans in the medical faculty, and if we are to believe all they say, they cure diseases internal and cutaneous, either by drinking or bathing. The baths and medicinal waters of Embs, Wiltbaden, Schwalbach, Wildungen, and Brakel, likewise perform their wonders in almost all diseases. The mineral springs at the last-mentioned place are said to intoxicate as soon as wine, and therefore they are inclosed. Carlsbad and Baden baths have been described and recommended by many great physicians, and used with great success by many royal personages.

After all, many are of opinion that great part of the salutary virtues ascribed to these waters is owing to the exercises and amusements of the patients. It is the interest of the proprietors to provide for both; and many of the German princes feel the benefit of the many elegant and polite institutions for the diversion of the public. The neatness, cleanliness, and conveniency of the places of public resort are incredible; and though at first they were attended with expence, yet they more than pay themselves in a few years by the company which crowds to them from all parts of the world; many of whom do not repair thither for health, but for amusement and conversation.

Germany abounds in both minerals and metals. Bohemia, and many places in the circle of Austria, and other parts of Germany, contain mines of silver, quicksilver, copper, tin, iron, lead, sulphur, nitre, and vitriol. Salt-petre, salt-mines, and salt-pits are found in Austria, Bavaria, Silesia, and the Lower Saxony; as are carbuncles, amethysts, jasper, sapphire, agate, alabaster, several sorts of pearls, turquois stones, and the finest of rubies, which adorn the cabinets of the greatest princes and virtuosi. In Bavaria, Tirol, and Liege, are quarries of curious marble, slate, chalk, ochre, red lead, allum, and bitumen; besides other fossils. In several places are dug up stones, which to a strong fancy represent different animals, and sometimes trees of the human form. Many of the German circles furnish coal-pits, and the terra sigillata of Metz, with white, yellow, and red veins, is thought to be an antidote against poison.

Vegetable and animal productions differ in Germany very little, if at all, from other countries; but naturalists are of opinion, that had the Germans, even before the middle of this century, been acquainted with agriculture, their country would have been the most fruitful of any in Europe. Even in its present, what we may call rude state, provisions are more cheap and plentiful in Germany than in any other country perhaps in the world; witness the prodigious armies which the most uncultivated part of it maintained during the late war, while many of the richest and most fertile provinces remained untouched. The country in general yields great plenty of wheat, buck wheat, rye, spelt, barley, oats, peas, beans, vetches, and all kinds of vegetables, fruits, and fish.

The Rhenish and Moselle wines differ from those of other countries in a peculiar lightness and deterfive quality, more sovereign in some diseases than any medicine.

The German wild boar differs in colour from our common hogs. Their flesh, and the hams made of it, is preferred by many, even to those of Westmoreland, for flavour and grain. The glutton in Germany is said to be the most voracious of all animals. Its prey is almost every thing that has life, which it can master, especially birds, hares, rabbits, goats, and fawns, whom they surprise artfully and devour greedily. On these the glutton feeds so ravenously, that it falls into a kind of a torpid state, and not being able to move, he is killed by the huntsmen; but though both boars and wolves will kill him in that condition, they will not eat him. His colour is a beautiful brown, with a faint tinge of red.

Germany yields abundance of excellent heavy horses; but their oxen and sheep are not comparable to those of England; probably owing to the want of skill in feeding and rearing them. Some parts of Germany are remarkable for fine larks, and great variety of singing birds, which are sent to all parts of Europe. Game is found every where in abundance.

As the empire of Germany is a collection of separate states, each having a different government and police, we can say little with precision as to the number of its inhabitants; but if they are fixed at 20,000,000, the number is perhaps not exaggerated. When the landholders become better acquainted with agriculture and cultivation, population must naturally increase among them.

The Germans in their persons are tall, fair, and strong built. The ladies have generally fine complexions; and some of them, especially in Saxony, have all the delicacy of features and shape that are so bewitching.

The most unhappy part of the Germans are the tenants of little needy princes, who squeeze them to keep up their own grandeur; but in general the circumstances of the common people are far preferable to those of the French.

Religion is a copious article, but I shall confine myself to what is most necessary to be known. Before the Reformation introduced by Luther, the German bishops were possessed (as indeed many of them are at this day) of prodigious power and revenues, and were the tyrants of the emperors as well as the people. Their ignorance was only equalled by their superstition. The Bohemians were the first who had an idea of reformation, and made so glorious a stand for many years against the errors of Rome, that they were indulged in the liberty of taking the sacrament in both kinds, and other freedoms not tolerated in the Romish church. This was in a great measure owing to Wickliff, an Englishman, who went much farther in reforming the real errors of popery than Luther himself. Wickliff was seconded by John Hufs, and Jerome of Prague, who, notwithstanding the emperor's safe conduct, were infamously burnt at the council of Constance.

The Reformation introduced afterwards by Luther, though it struck at the chief abuses in the church of Rome, was thought in some points (particularly that of consubstantiation, by which the real body of Christ, as well as the elements of bread bread and wine, is supposed to be taken in the sacrament) to be imperfect. Calvinism, therefore, or the religion of Geneva; (as now practised in the church of Scotland) was introduced into Germany, and is now the religion of the king of Prussia, the landgrave of Hesse, and some other princes, who maintain a parity of orders in the church. Some go so far as to say, that the numbers of Protestants and Papists in the empire are now almost equal. Germany, particularly Bohemia, Moravia, and the Palatinate, is over-run with sectaries of all kinds, and Jews abound in the empire. At present, the modes of worship and forms of church government are by the Protestant German princes considered in a civil rather than a religious light. The present emperor first granted a free toleration of religion throughout his dominions, soon after declared himself head of the church in the same; and has since abolished the greatest part of the nunneries and convents, suffering the remaining ones to exist only under great restrictions.

There are six archbishoprics in Germany, which are differently represented by authors, some of whom represent Vienna as being a suffragan to the archbishopsee of Saltzburgh; and others as being an archbishopric, but depending immediately upon the Pope. The others are the archbishop of Mentz, who has under him 12 suffragans; but one of them, the bishop of Bamberg, is said to be exempted from his jurisdiction: Triers has three suffragans; Cologne has four; Magdeburg has five; Saltzburgh has nine, besides Vienna; and Bremen three.

At different periods since the Reformation it has been found expedient, to satisfy the claims of temporal princes, to secularize the following bishopsees, Bremen, Verden, Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Minden, Osnaburg, (which goes alternately to the house of Bavaria and Hanover, and is at present held by his Britannic majesty's second son,) and Lubec. Such of those sees as were archbishoprics are now considered as duchies, and the bishoprics as principalities.

The Teutonic part of the German tongue is an original language, and has no relation to the Celtic. It is called High Dutch, and is the mother tongue of all Germany; but varies so much in its dialect, that the people of one province scarcely understand those of another. Latin and French are the most useful languages in Germany, when a traveller is ignorant of High Dutch.

No country has produced a greater variety of authors than Germany, and there is no where a more general taste for reading, especially in the Protestant countries. Printing is encouraged to a fault; every man of letters is an author; they multiply books without number; thousands of theses and disputations are annually published; for no man can be a graduate in their universities, who has not published one disputation at least. In this country there are 36 universities, of which 17 are Protestant, 17 Roman Catholic, and two mixed; besides a vast number of colleges, gymnasia, pedagogies, and Latin schools. There are also many academies and societies for the promoting the study of natural philosophy, the belles lettres, antiquities, painting, sculpture, architecture, &c. as the Imperial Leopoldine academy of the natural curiosities; the academy of sciences at Vienna, at Berlin, at Gottengen, at Erfurth, at Leipzig, at Duisburgh, at Bremen, at Giesen, and at Hamburg. At Dresden and Nuremberg are academies for painting; at Berlin, a royal military academy; and at Augsburg is the Imperial Franciscan academy of fine arts, to which we may add the Latin society at Genoa. Of the public libraries, the most celebrated are those of Vienna, Berlin, Halle, Wolfenbuttel, Hanover, Gottengen, Weimar, and the council library at Leipzig.

With respect to the fine arts, the Germans have acquitted themselves tolerably well. Germany has produced some good painters, architects, sculptors, and engravers. They even pretend to have been the first inventors of engraving, etching, and metzotinto. Printing, if first invented in Holland, was, soon after, greatly improved in Germany. The Germans are generally allowed to be the first inventors of great guns; as also of gun-powder in Europe, about the year 1320. Germany has likewise produced some excellent musicians.

Every court of Germany produces a cabinet of curiosities, artificial and natural, ancient and modern. The vast Gothic palaces, cathedrals, castles, and above all, town-houses, in Germany are very curious: they strike the beholder with an idea of rude magnificence; and sometimes they have an effect that is preferable even to Greek architecture. The chief houses in great cities and villages have the same appearance, probably, as they had 400 years ago; and their fortifications generally consist of a brick-wall, trenches filled with water, and bastions or half-moons.

Next to the lakes and waters, the caves and rocks are the chief natural curiosities of Germany.

Germany has vast advantages in point of commerce, from its situation in the heart of Europe, and perforated, as it were, with great rivers. Its native materials for commerce (besides the mines and minerals) are hemp, hops, flax, anise, cummin, tobacco, saffron, madder, truffles, variety of excellent pot-herbs, and fine fruits, equal to those of France and Italy. Germany exports to other countries corn, tobacco, horses, lean cattle, butter, cheese, honey, wax, wines, linen, and wool, len yarn, ribbands, silk, and cotton stuffs, toys, turnery wares in wood, metals, and ivory, goat skins, wool, timber, both for ship-building and houses, cannon and bullets, bombs and bomb-shells, iron plates and stoves, tinned plates, steel work, copper, brass-wire, porcelain, the finest upon earth, earthen ware, glasses, mirrors, hog's bristles, mumm, beer, tartan, smalts, zaffer, Prussian blue, painter's ink, and many other things. Some think that the balance of trade between England and Germany is to the disadvantage of the former; but others are of a different opinion, as they cannot import coarse woollen manufactures, and several other commodities, so cheap from any other country.

The revocation of the edict of Nantes, by Lewis XIV. which obliged the French Protestants to settle in different parts of Europe, was of infinite service to the German manufactures. They now make velvets, silks, stuffs of all kinds, fine and coarse, linen and thread, and every thing necessary for wear, to great perfection. The porcelain of Meissen, in the electorate of Saxony, and its paintings, exceed that of all the world.

Almost every prince in Germany (and there are about 300 of them) is arbitrary with regard to the government of his own estates; but the whole of them form a great confederacy, governed by political laws, at the head of which is the emperor, and whose power in the collective body or the diet, is not directorial, but executive, and even that gives him vast influence. The supreme power in Germany is in the diet, which is composed of the emperor, or in his absence, of his commissary, and of the three colleges of the empire. The first of these is the electoral college; the second is the college of princes; and the third the college of imperial towns.

The dignity of the empire, though elective, has for some centuries belonged to the house of Austria, as being the most powerful of the German princes; but by French management, upon the death of Charles VI. grandfather, by the mother's side, to the present emperor, the elector of Bavaria was chosen to that dignity, and died, as is supposed, of a broken heart, after a short uncomfortable reign. The power of the emperor is regulated by the capitulation he signs at his election; and the person, who in his life-time is chosen king of the Romans, succeeds without a new election to the empire. He can confer titles and enfranchisements upon cities and towns, but as emperor he can levy no taxes, nor make war, nor peace without the consent of the diet. When that consent is obtained, every prince must contribute his quota of men and money, as valued in the matriculation roll, though, perhaps, as an elector or prince, he may espouse a different side from that of the diet. This forms the intricacy of the German constitution; for George II. of England was obliged to furnish his quota against the house of Austria, and the king of Prussia while he was fighting for them both. The emperor claims a precedence for his ambassadors in all Christian courts.

The electors of the empire are nine in number. Each has a particular office in the imperial court, and they have the sole election of the emperor. They are in order,

1. The archbishop of Mentz, who is high chancellor of the empire when in Germany.

2. The archbishop of Treves, who is high chancellor of the empire in France.

3. The archbishop of Cologne, who is the same in Italy.

4. The king, or rather elector of Bohemia, who is cup-bearer.

5. The elector of Bavaria, who is grand sewer, or officer who serves out the feasts.

6. The elector of Saxony, who is grand marshal of the empire.

7. The elector of Brandenburg, (now king of Prussia) who is great chamberlain.

8. The elector Palatine, who is great steward; and

9. The elector of Hanover, (king of Great Britain) who claims the part of arch-treasurer.

It is necessary for the emperor, before he calls a diet, to have the advice of those members; and during the vacancy of the imperial throne the electors of Saxony and Bavaria have jurisdiction, the former over the northern, and the latter over the southern circles.

The ecclesiastical princes are as absolute as the temporal ones in their several dominions. The chief of these, besides the three ecclesiastical electors already mentioned, are the archbishop of Saltzburg, the bishops of Liege, Munster, Spire, Worms, Wirtzburg, Strasburgh, Osnaburgh, Bamberg, and Paderborn. Besides these are many other ecclesiastical princes. Germany abounds with many abbots and abbeesses, whose jurisdictions are likewise absolute; and some of them very considerable, and all of them are chosen by their several chapters. The chief of the secular princes are, the landgrave of Hesse, the dukes of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, Wirtemberg, Mecklenburgh, Saxe-Gotha, the marquises of Baden and Culmbach, with the princes of Nassau, Anhalt, Furstenburg, and many others, who have all high titles, and are sovereigns in their own dominions. The free cities are likewise sovereign states; those which which are imperial, or compose a part of the diet, bear the imperial eagle in their arms; those which are Hanse towns have still greater privileges and immunities, but they subsist no longer as a political body.

The imperial chamber, and that of Wetzlaar, which is better known by the name of the Aulic Council, are the two supreme courts for determining the great causes of the empire, arising between its respective members. The imperial council consists of 50 judges or assessors. The president and four of them are appointed by the emperor, and each of the electors choose one, and the other princes and states the rest. This court is at present held at Wetzlaar, but formerly it resided at Spire; and causes may be brought before it by appeal. The aulic council was originally no better than a revenue court of the dominions of the house of Austria. As the family's power increased, the jurisdiction of the aulic council was extended, and at last, to the great disgust of the princes of the empire, it usurped upon the powers of the imperial chamber, and even of the diet. It consists of a president, a vice-chancellor, a vice-president, a certain number of aulic counsellors, of whom six are Protestants, besides other officers: but the emperor, in fact, is master of the court.

These courts follow the ancient laws of the empire for their guides, the golden bull, the pacification of Passau, and the civil law.

Besides these courts of justice, each of the nine circles I have already mentioned has a director to take care of the peace and order of the circle.

After, upon any great emergency, the votes of the diet are collected, and sentence pronounced, the emperor by his prerogative commits the execution of it to a particular prince or princess, whose troops live at free quarter upon the estates of the delinquent party, and he is obliged to make good all expences; upon the whole, the constitution of the Germanic body is of itself a study of no small difficulty. But however plausibly invented the several checks upon the imperial power may be, it is certain that the house of Austria has more than once endangered the liberties of the empire, and that they have been saved by the jealousy of France. At present a great power, the house of Brandenburg, has started up to balance the Austrian greatness; and there seems to be no great appearance of any internal commotions among the princes of the empire, a circumstance that is extremely favourable to the tranquillity of Europe, and the interest of Great Britain in particular. Before I close this head, it may be necessary to inform the reader of the meaning of a term which has of late frequently appeared in the German history, I mean that of the Pragmatic Sanction.

G E

This is no other than a provision made by the emperor Charles VI. for preserving the indivisibility of the Austrian dominions in the person of the next descendant of the last possessor, whether male or female. This provision has been often disputed by other branches of the house of Austria, who have been occasionally supported by France from political views, though the Pragmatic Sanction is strongly guaranteed by almost all the powers of Europe. The late emperor, elector of Bavaria, and the late king of Poland attempted to overthrow it, as being descended from the daughters of the emperor Joseph, elder brother to Charles VI. It has likewise been again and again opposed by the court of Spain.

Few of the territories of the German princes are so large as to be assigned to viceroys, to be oppressed and fleeced at pleasure; nor are they without redress when they suffer any grievance; they may appeal to the general diet or great council of the empire for relief. Whereas in France the lives and fortunes of the subjects are entirely at the disposal of the grand monarch. The subjects of the petty princes in Germany are generally the most unhappy; for these princes, affecting the grandeur and splendor of the more powerful, in the number and appearance of their officers and domestics, in their palaces, gardens, pictures, curiosities, guards, bands of music, tables, dress, and furniture, are obliged to support all this vain pomp and parade at the expence of their vassals and dependents. The most brilliant parts of a German court are usually its military, its music, and its hunt. With respect to the burghers and peasants of Germany, the former in many places enjoy great privileges; the latter also, in some parts, for instance, in Franconia, Suabia, and on the Rhine, are generally a free people, or perform only certain services to their superiors, and only pay taxes; whereas in the marquissate of Brandenburg, Pomerania, Lusatia, Moravia, Bohemia, Austria, &c. they may be justly denominated slaves, though in different degrees.

The revenue of the emperor, who, as such, has an annual income of about 5 or 6000 pounds sterling, arising from some inconsiderable fiefs in the Black Forest. The Austrian revenues are immense, and are thought to amount to 7,000,000 sterling in Germany and Italy, a sum that goes far in those countries. The late king of Prussia, whose revenues were not near so extensive as those of his present majesty, though he maintained a large army, was so good an oeconomist, that he left 7,000,000 sterling in his coffers; and some have thought that Silesia alone brings a million sterling every year to this king. To behold the magnificence of many of the German courts, a stranger.

Stranger is apt to conceive high ideas of the incomes of their princes, which is owing to the high price of money in that country, and consequently the low price of provisions and manufactures. In fact, though it is plain that some princes have much larger revenues than others, yet we cannot speak with any tolerable precision, on a subject of such variety and uncertainty, and which comprehends so many independent states.

During the two last wars, very little regard was paid, in carrying them on, to the ancient German constitutions, the whole management being engrossed by the head of the house of Austria. The elector of Mentz keeps what is called a matriculation book or register, which among other letters contains the assessments of men and money, which every prince and state, who are members of the empire, is to advance when the army of the empire takes the field. The contributions in money are called Roman months, on account of the monthly assessments paid to the emperors when the visited Rome. Those assessments however are subject to great mutability. It is sufficient here to say, that upon a moderate computation, the secular princes of the empire can bring to the field 379,000 men, and the ecclesiastical 74,500, in all 453,500; of those the emperor, as head of the house of Austria, is supposed to furnish 90,000.

By this computation, which is far from being exaggerated, it appears that the emperor and empire form the most powerful government in Europe; and if the whole force was properly directed, under an able general, Germany would have nothing to fear from any of its ambitious neighbours. But the different interests pursued by the several princes of Germany, render the power of the emperor of little consequence, except in regard of his own forces, which are indeed very formidable.

GERMERSHEIM, a small town of Deux-Ponts, in the Palatinate, in Germany. It is the capital of its bailiwick, on the W. side of the Rhine almost opposite to Philippsburg, from which it is about a German mile. Here is a bridge over the river. By the treaty of Ryswick, it was ceded by the French, and annexed to the Palatinate. It lies 15 miles E. of Landau. Lat. 49, 21, N. Long. 8, 22, E.

Of the same name is its bailiwick, which is subdivided into five districts; namely, Germersheim Proper, Seltz, Altenstadt, Hagenbach, and Gornstein, containing 140 parishes. It suffered greatly in the war about the close of the preceding century.

GERMAN, or GERMAIN, the present name of Phrygia Major, in Asia. See PHRYGIA.

GERRA. See GERZITES.

GERSAW, or GERISAW, a small place in the canton of Lucern, in Switzerland. It lies on the Lucerne lake, between the canton of this name and Schwitz. It is remarkable, as being a sort of petty sovereign republic, entirely independent for time immemorial; but under the protection of the four neighbouring cantons, who, by authentic acts, as far back as 1351, made an alliance with the burghers of Gersaw as their equals, and admitted them among their allies.

GERSBACH, a small town of Baden-Dourlach, and circle of Suabia, in Germany. Here is a palace of the marquis of Baden-Dourlach, and a court of judicature, with two churches, the one for Lutherans, and the other for Roman Catholics.

GER-

G E

GERTRUYDENBERG, a small fortified town of Dort, and province of Holland. It lies upon the Macse or Meruwe, which is here very broad, and the E. extremity of Biesbach lake, subject to the prince of Orange. On one side is the river, and a marsh on the other. It has been often taken, and is particularly famous for the conferences held here towards the preliminaries of a peace, between the Confederates and French in 1710. The river yields good salmon, sturgeon, and such plenty of shads, that 10,000 are said to have been taken in one day here. It lies 12 miles N. of Breda, and 15 S. E. of Dort. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 4, 49 E.

GERUMENHA, an ancient and fortified town of Alentejo, in Portugal. It stands upon a hill, and on the W. shore of the Guadiana. Here is a strong castle with 17 towers. In 1662, it stood out a whole month's close siege from the Spaniards before it was taken. It lies 18 miles below Badajoz. Lat. 38, 30, N. Long. 9, 57, E.

GESECK, a fortified town of Cologne, in Germany, bordering on the bishopric of Paderborn in Westphalia. It has been twice taken in the German and religious wars, but restored to the elector by the treaty of Munster. It lies about 12 miles N. W. of Arnberg.

GESTRICIA, or GESTRICKLAND, a district of Nördland, in Sweden Proper. It is bounded on the N. by the little river Fynea, dividing it from Helsingia, has the Bothnic gulph on the E. the river Dala separates it from Uplandia on the S. and it borders on Dalecarlia on the W. The river Hafsunda, divides this territory into two parts. Here are very good mines, but otherwise it is a barren tract, and produces hardly corn enough for its inhabitants.

GESVES, a village of Melli, one of the provinces of Negroland, in Africa. It is said to contain 4000 inhabitants, among which are not above 12 families of whites, the rest being all tawny or black, though they call themselves true Portuguese. Here is a trade for slaves, wax, and ivory. It lies 65 leagues above the mouth of the river of the same name to the east, and 40 from Biffaux, to the south.

GESVES, a river of the last mentioned province, in Africa, running nearly E. and W. The Portuguese have a factory on this river.

GETHSEMANE, mentioned Matt. xxvi. 36. Mark xiv. 32. between the foot of mount Olivet, and the brook Cedron, is shewn a plat of ground, supposed to be the very said place, not above 57 yards square, and now at this time very famous for its olive trees; at the upper corner of the garden, is a flat naked ledge of rock, reputed to be the place in which the apostles Peter, James, and John, fell asleep, during the agony of our Lord. And a few paces from hence is a grotto, said to be the place in which Christ underwent that bitter part of his passion. About eight paces from the place where the apostles slept, is a small slip of ground 12 yards long and one broad, supposed to be the very path on which the traitor Judas walked up to Christ, saying, 'Hail Master', and kissed him.' This narrow path is separated by a wall out of the midst of the garden, as an accursed piece of ground, a work the more remarkable, as being done by the Turks, who as well as Christians detest the very ground on which was acted such an infamous treachery.

GEVALIA, GEVELS, or GAFLE, a town of Gestrícia and Nördland, in Sweden Proper. It stands on a bay that serves for a harbour to this place, upon the Bothnic gulph. It has a bridge, and lies 55 miles from Upsal, to the N.

GEVAUDAN, in Latin, Ager Gehalensis, from its ancient inhabitants the Gabali, a subdivision of Languedoc, in France. It is one of the three parts of the Sevennes, lying mostly among the mountains, near the source of the Allier, Lot, and Tarn. It is bounded on the N. by Auvergne, on the W. by Rouergue, on the S. by Lower Languedoc, and on the E. by Valais and Vivarais. It is also divided into the Upper Gevaudan, which lies in the mountains La Marguerite and Aubrac; and the Lower, which constitutes a part of the Sevennes. Some of its mountains are barren; and the others produce nothing but rye and chesnuts, yet most of the inhabitants follow some trade, making serges and other stuffs, sold very cheap into Swisserland, Germany, Italy, and even the Levant, to the annual amount, they say, of above 2,000,000 livres.

GEVER, GEWERES, or GOAR, (St.) a town of Rhinesfeldt, a territory of the Upper Rhine, and diocese of Triers, in Germany. It lies upon the Rhine, and belongs to the prince of Hesse-Rhinefeldt, about 20 miles S. of Coblentz. Lat. 50, 28, N. Long. 7, 23, E.

GEX, a small territory of Burgundy, in France. It is separated from Bugey by mount Credo, a part of that of Jura, between which it lies, and between the Rhone, the lake of Geneva, and Swisserland. The most important place in this country is the passes l'Ecluse, where the entrance into Bugey and Bresse is defended by a fort cut in a steep rock, and a part of mount Jura, at the bottom of which runs the Rhone. In Gex are several villages belonging to the republic of Geneva.

G E

GEX, the capital of the above-mentioned territory of its name, a village at the foot of mount St. Claude, near the lake of Geneva, about 10 miles N. W. of the city of the latter name, and 50 S. E. of Châlons. Here is a small college. Lat. 46. 33. N. Long. 6. 15. E.

GEYSMER, a small town, but the capital of a bailiwick, in Lower Hesse, and circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany. It lies 20 miles N. of Cassel city.

GEZIR, or GEZIRA, a small city of Diarbeker, the ancient Mesopotamia, in Asiatic Turkey. It is the seat of a bey, and a place of rendezvous for merchants to buy tobacco and gall-nuts, the latter being in great plenty on mount Taurus. It lies upon an island in the river Tigris. Over the river is a bridge of boats. It lies 72 miles S. of Diarbeker, and nearly as many above Mosul. Lat. 37. 30. N. Long. 39. 10. E.

GEZUL, or GEZULA, seems a corruption of the ancient Getulia, a province of Africa, whose inhabitants value themselves on being the oldest people in Barbary, and as retaining their ancient name. Their country lies between Tafilet to the E. Etata to the N. Sus and mount Laalem to the W. with the desert of Biledulgerid to the S. It contains only boroughs or villages, some of the former have 1000 or more houses. The nations are barbarous, and mostly employed in copper and iron-mines, as also in utensils made from these metals, which are exchanged for cloaths, linen, horses, spices, and other things they want. The country yields a good deal of barley, but no other grain. It has pasture-grounds, cattle, and especially dates. The inhabitants are very numerous, this province being able, it is said, to raise 62,000 men.

GHEENT, by the natives called Gent, in French Gand, and in Latin Gandæ or Gandavum, the capital city of the Austrian Netherlands. It is watered by several rivers, as the Scheld, the Lys, the Lieve, and Moor-water, all navigable, besides canals, by which means it is commodiously situated for a foreign trade; here the silk, woollen, and linen manufactures flourish, one third of its 50 trading companies being of this sort; and it deals considerably in corn. It has walls, trenches, and other defences, being 12 miles in circuit, besides a castle, with four regular bastions; but of no great strength, by reason of the extensive grounds within these places, above half of which consists of fields and gardens; so that it would require an army for its defence. Its rivers and canals form about 26 islands, which are joined by a great number of bridges, upon one of which is a statue of brass, of a young man going to cut off his father's head; but as he was striking the blow the blade flew off, on which they were pardoned. In the town-house, is a picture of this transaction. The greatest advantage of this place is, that by shutting up the sluices, all the country for about a mile round can be laid under water. The inhabitants have always been warlike. In 1539, they revolted from the emperor Charles V. who punished the inhabitants most severely. Here the States-General of the Netherlands, except Luxembourg and Limburg, concluded the famous pacification of Ghent, Nov. 8. 1576, for the maintenance of their ancient privileges, afterwards ratified by king Philip II. They afterwards took the oaths to the prince of Orange. Here in queen Anne's wars, the English foot, commonly took up their winter-quarters, sometimes to the number of 24 regiments, who had a chapel, in which the English service was performed. Though the natives reckon this a healthy climate, some thousands of that nation's troops lie buried in St. Peter's hill before the large barracks. In Ghent are seven parish-churches, with 55 monasteries and nunneries. The French took this place in 1678, but restored it by the peace of Nimeguen. The seized it again, upon the death of king Charles II. of Spain; but after the battle of Ramillies, in 1706, it surrendered to the allies.

In 1708, it was betrayed to the French; but the duke of Marlborough having reduced Lisle and invested Ghent, in December of that year, it surrendered in two or three days; though the French had a garrison in the place of 20,000 men; and directly afterwards they evacuated all Flanders. It is the see of a bishop, who is suffragan to the archbishop of Mechlin; its first prelate was the celebrated Janfenius, from whom the Janfenists take their name; he flourished in 1568. Its cathedral is a large and ancient structure, and under is a noble crypta, or subterraneous church. In the high tower, called the Belfroy, near the town-house, is a bell called Roeland, weighing 11,000 pounds, with a dragon of gilt copper at top, said to have been sent from Constantinople; and the ascent is by 300 steps. Its civil government is in the hands of a burgomaster or mayor, under the title of Hoog-balijuw, and eichepius or aldermen. One of its canals leads to Bruges, and the other to Sas-van Ghent, and from thence to the sea. This was the birth-place of John duke of Lancaster, hence surnamed John of Gaunt or Ghent, and third son of Edward III. king of England; as also of the emperor Charles V. of whom is a noble statue in the great square, called Friday's-market, and in the market-place of Cortere, is a remarkable fine walk under several rows of trees. In 1737, a fine opera-house was built here, and a guard-house for the garrison. Ghent lies 35 miles miles N. W. of Brussels. Lat. 51, 12, N. Long. 3, 36, E.

GHILIAN, (St.) a town of Hainault, belonging to French Flanders; it stands on the river Haine, seven miles W. of Mons. The Allies surprised the place; but it was soon recovered by the French in Nov. 1708. Lat. 50, 36, N. Long. 3, 56, E.

GIANT'S-CAUSEWAY, a remarkable pile of rocks on the coast of Antrim, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. Though fondly supposed by the vulgar to be a work of giants, is evidently the work of nature, and runs from the bottom of a high hill into the Northern ocean. See ANTRIM.

GIANT'S-TOMB, a high mountain in the Peak of Derbyshire.

GIANUTI, a small island along the Tuscan coast in Italy. It lies low towards the middle, and is but poorly inhabited, by reason of pirates that infest it; so that it has but one village upon it, defended by an old castle on a neighbouring hill. Lat. 42, 25, N. Long. 11, 54, E.

GIARRETTO, or RIVER of St. PAUL, formerly the Simetus, and under that name celebrated by the poets. The nymph Thalia, after her amour with Jupiter, is supposed to have been changed into this stream. This river was navigable in the time of the Romans, and the only one so in Sicily. It takes its rise on the N. side of Ætna, and surrounding the W. skirts of that mountain falls into the sea. Great quantities of amber is thrown up at its mouth, which is gathered by the peasants, and carried to Catania, where it is manufactured into crosses, beads, &c. and sold at a high price.

GIAWLE, GEFLE, or GEVALIA, a well situated staple-town of Sweden Proper, on the gulph of Bothnia, and a river of its name, half a mile from the sea. It maintains that its right of staple is 300 years prior to that of Stockholm. Here is a castle of seven towers. It lies 86 miles N. of Stockholm. Lat. 60, 45, N. Long. 37, 56, E.

GEBAL, the ancient name of Byblos in Phoenice, and Asiatic Turkey, whose inhabitants, the Gebalites, are mentioned in 1 Kings, as expert in hewing of timber, and conveying of cedars by water to Joppa, for the use of Solomon's temple.

GIBEAH, or GIBEAH-SAUL, as being the native place of that prince, and to distinguish it from that of Gibeah-Phineas, a city of Ephraim in Judea, and Asiatic Turkey. It was noted for the abuse its inhabitants offered to the Levite, &c. and had like to have ended in the total extirpation of the Benjamites and their city.

GIBEON, or GABAON, the capital of the Gibeonites, who drawing Joshua into an alliance by a stratagem, were hewers of wood, and drawers of water, in the tabernacle and temple, and commonly called Nethenims. It was a populous and opulent city of Judea in Asiatic Turkey, stood on a hill, and had a famous pool or conduit. It lies 40 stadia, or eight miles N. of Jerusalem.

GIBRALION, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, seated on the river Odiel, with a handsome castle, and the title of a marquise.

GIBRALTAR, a famous promontory, or rather peninsula, of Spain, lying in N. lat. 35, 50, W. long. 5, 35. To the ancients it was known by the name of Calpe, and was also called one of the Pillars of Hercules; by the Arabians it is called Gebel Tarek, that is, the mount of Tarek, from Tarek, the name of the Saracen general who conquered Spain in the beginning of the eighth century. The whole is an immense peninsula, about 440 yards, measuring, from the bay, about two English miles, but not above one in breadth from E. to W. The town lies along the bay on the W. side of the mountain on a decline; by which, generally speaking, the rains pass through it, and keep it clean. The old town was considerably larger than the new, which at present consists of between 4 and 500 houses. Many of the streets are narrow and irregular; the buildings are of different materials, some of natural stone out of the quarries, some of a factitious or artificial stone, and a few of brick. The people are supplied with fresh provisions chiefly from the coast of Barbary, with fruit, roots, and vegetables, of all sorts from thence, or from their own gardens. Besides what is properly called the town, there are several spacious and commodious public edifices erected, such as barracks for the soldiers, with apartments for their officers, magazines of different kinds, store-houses for provisions, &c. all which received great damage by a storm in 1766. The inhabitants, exclusive of the British subjects dependent on the garrison, or who reside there from other motives, consist of some Spaniards, a few Portuguese, a considerable number of Genoese, and about as many Jews, making in the whole, according to Dr. Campbell, between 2 and 3000, without reckoning the garrison; though some make them fewer, but during the present siege, very few have been suffered to remain in the town beside the military. The town may be said to have two ports, the first lying to the N. and is proper only for small vessels, the other is very commodious for large vessels, and has a fine stone quay. The bay is very beautiful and capacious, being in breadth about five miles, and in depth eight or nine, with several small rivers running into it. It is very advantageous to the place. There is no ground to be found in the middle of it at 100 fathoms depth, so that a squadron may lie there in great safety: the breezes from it are very refreshing; and it contributes likewise to the subsistence of the inhabitants, by supplying them with great plenty of fish.

The strait of Gibraltar, through which the ocean passes into the Mediterranean, thereby dividing Europe from Africa, runs from W. to E. about 13 leagues. In this strait there are three remarkable promontories or capes on the Spanish side, and as many opposite to them on the Barbary side. The first of these on the side of Spain, is cape Trefalgar, opposite to which is cape Spartel; and in the neighbourhood of this stood the fortrefs of Tangier; once in the possession of the British. The next on the Spanish side is Tarifa; and over against it lies Malabata, near the town of Alcazar, where the straits are about five leagues broad. Lastly, Gibraltar, facing the mountain of Abyla, near the fortrefs and town of Ceuta, which make the eastern entry of the straits.

The head of the rock of Gibraltar is composed of white stone, which is burnt for lime. The batteries facing Spain appear next; on which account the Spaniards call this part of the hill "una boca de fuego," a mouth of fire. The remains of the Moorish castle are close to the batteries; lower down, and level with the water, is the grand battery, under which is the land gate.

Though the rock of Gibraltar is surrounded by the sea, well water is to be found all over it, pretty good, and fit to drink, though heavy, and often brackish; but the rain water from the mountain, which is filtered through the red sands without the south port, is exceedingly good and wholesome, and remains uncorrupt a long time. It is collected into a reservoir, and from thence conducted to the town. This aqueduct was first begun by the Moors, and carried by earthen pipes; in their time it reached to the city, supplying the Atarafana and the castle; that now existing was planned by a Spanish Jesuit, and only reaches to the grand parade. The hill universally abounds with cavities, and receptacles for rain, which mostly center in the reservoir; affording an inexhaustible stock of excellent water, greatly contributing to the health of the inhabitants.

Gibraltar was surprised in 1540 by Paul Hamet, an Algerine corsair; the landing was then easy. Now it is supposed to be the strongest garrison in Europe.

From the 8th to the 14th century, there is no particular occurrence worth recording; the Moors remained in quiet possession of it. In 1310 Alonzo Perez de Guzman first took it from the Infidels, which so enraged the Moors that they murdered their king, Mahomet, the third king of Granada.

The second siege was in 1316, when Ishmael, king of Grenada, in vain attempted to retake it.

The third commenced in February, 1332, under Abomelique, son of Jusuf Aben Jacob, emperor of Fez. Vasco Peyrez de Meyra commanded in the place, which was very ill provided, and had not 30 days bread in it, Meyra having applied the king's money to purchasing an estate at Xeres, instead of victualling the garrison. A Moorish vessel loaded with corn, which a storm drove under the walls, prolonged the siege for some time; but the Spaniards, after enduring incredible fatigue and famine, and subsisting for weeks on the leather of their shields, were starved into a surrender by the middle of June; though the Spanish admiral, don Alonzo Jusfe, was master of the sea, and from his gallies endeavoured, by means of engines, to throw bags of flour over the walls into the town. Don Alonzo XI. marching to succour it, was only four days journey from the place, when he received the fatal news of its surrender. Vaquez Peyrez de Meyra not daring to appear before him, went over to the Moors in Barbary.

Don Alonzo XI. began the fourth siege the end of June 1332. To this day may be traced the ditch he dug from sea to sea, to defend the rear of his army, which he divided into three divisions; the main body occupied the sands under the hill, from the Ocean to the Mediterranean; the second division he sent in boats to the southward of the town, which took post on the red sands; the third climbed up to the north of the hill above the castle, which they incommoded by throwing down from engines huge stones into it. It is amazing how the Spaniards could drag machines up so steep and rugged a rock. The Moors drew all their gallies ashore, and those for which there was not room in the Atarafana, they covered with strong sheds of timber, to preserve them from being crushed by the rocks the Spaniards threw from their engines. Don Alonzo Jusfe, the Spanish admiral, had orders to burn these gallies, but the Moors prevented his approach by piles driven into the sea. The king offered two doubloons of gold for every stone the miners could force out from the walls of the castle, which the engines had so dismantled, especially the Torre del Hominage, that the Moors could not man the tops of the turrets. The largeness of the reward encouraged a party of Gallegos to attempt extracting the stones, under cover of a strong machine called Manta, similar to the Musculus of the Romans, a machine in use till the invention of gun-powder. This manœuvre would soon have brought the tower to the ground; but as the Moors could not man the battlements from the rocks thrown on them, they broke openings in the sides of the tower, tower, and threw down on the manta such quantities of burning pitch, tow, and other combustibles, as set it on fire, and forced the Gallegos to retreat. At this time the king of Grenada and Abomelique marched to its relief, and blocked up the Spanish king in the Neck of Gibraltar, which prevented his army receiving any provisions by land; so that when the bad weather kept off their supplies by sea, they experienced great want. Such numbers deserted through hunger, and fell into the hands of the Moors, that Christian slaves sold for a doubloon each. Once a contrary wind for 17 days occasioned a dreadful famine, when don Alonzo, to give his famished troops an example of patience, abstained from tasting meat for eight days, till a convoy arrived. At last, on the 20th of August, a peace was concluded, and the siege was raised.

Don Alonzo again sat down before it in the summer 1349, and during this fifth siege, of nine months, had reduced the garrison to great want, when the plague carried him off on the 26th of March 1350, in the 38th year of his age.

The emperors of Fez, neglecting their Spanish territories, Juzaf, third king of Grenada, took it in 1410. This was the sixth siege; but the next year the inhabitants drove out the Grenadines, and put themselves under the protection of Muley Bucid, emperor of Fez.

Juzaf besieged it in form the January following, with a fleet and army, and the garrison was starved into a surrender towards the end of March. This was the seventh siege.

The eighth siege was in 1438, in the reign of Don Juan II. when Don Enrique de Guzman, Conde de Niebla, attacked it by sea and land; but the Moors defeated him, and he was drowned in attempting to escape. His son got off with the remains of the army.

In 1462, he returned with a greater force, and took the place, which ever since has remained in possession of the Christians. This was the ninth siege. The Mahometans had possessed it 748 years. Don Enrique IV. of Castile, then on the throne of Spain, took the title of King of Gibraltar.

In 1704 Gibraltar was torn, most probably for ever, from the Spanish domain, by the English, under Sir George Rooke. In a council of war, held July 17, on board the English fleet, about seven leagues east of Tetuan, the attack was resolved upon. Four days after the fleet got into the bay of Gibraltar, and 1800 English and Dutch marines, under the prince of Hesse Darmstadt, were landed. On the 23d, soon after day-break, the ships being placed, the admiral threw out the signal for cannonading, which was continued with great fury for five or six hours, 15,000 shot being fired in that time against the town, so that the enemy were soon driven from their guns, especially at the South Mole Head. As the gaining that fortification would ensure the reduction of the town, the admiral ordered captain Whitaker with all the boats immediately to endeavour to possess it. But whilst he was pushing for it with great alacrity, the captains Hicks and Jumper, who lay next the Mole, landed some men from their pinnaces and boats before he came up. On this the Spaniards blew up the fortifications about the Mole, and killed two lieutenants and about 40 men, and wounded 60 more. Yet our men kept possession of the great platform, and Whitaker landing with the seamen who had been ordered on this service, they advanced and took a redoubt or small bastion, half way between the Mole and the town, and many of the enemy's cannon; upon which the governor desired to capitulate, and surrendered on honourable terms, which they did on the 24th. The prince of Hesse, with the marines belonging to the fleet, were left in garrison, and furnished from the fleet with every necessary for subsistence and defence, and a regular plan laid down for supplying them in future from Lisbon. This was the tenth siege.

Now the eleventh siege commenced under the marquis de Villadarias. He had with him all the forces the Spaniards could collect, with some French troops and French engineers; the latter had been sent from France on purpose, and were chiefly relied on. The siege lasted four months, during which the prince of Hesse eminently distinguished himself by his conduct, courage, and indefatigable application. The garrison was supplied with men and provisions from Lisbon. At last monsieur de Pointis came with a squadron of 20 French ships of war to block it up by sea. Upon which Sir John Leake was sent with a stronger squadron to relieve the place, and he arrived in the bay on the 9th of October. In the mean time the marshal de Tesse took the command of the besiegers; he had been sent by the court of France, which was dissatisfied with the conduct of Villadarias; but he had no better success, and the siege was at last abandoned in 1705. During this siege, the Spaniards made a desperate attempt to take it. On the east side of the rock, at Pasta de Algarovas, guided by a goat-herd, they got up 500 men, and concealed themselves in St. Michael's Cave; the second night they scaled Charles the Vth's wall, and surprised and murdered the guard at the signal house; and at Middle-hill, by ropes and scaling-ladders, they got up some hundreds of the party ordered to sustain them; but being discovered, they were all driven over that precipice which the Spaniards name Salta de Loba, or the Wolf's Leap.

In 1727 the twelfth siege commenced; it was carried on by the marquis de las Torres; it is only remarkable for a vain attempt of the Spanish engineers to blow up the head of the hill, by means of a mine under Will's or Queen's battery.

Under the dominion of Great Britain, the fortifications have been so improved and perfected, that joined to the natural strength of the place, they render it impregnable to every thing but famine or treachery, provided it is well garrisoned. There is generally kept in the magazines 18 months provisions. To the Moors it was the key of Spain, and the English deservedly reckon it the key of the Mediterranean.

From 1779 to 1782, the Spaniards have been carrying on the thirteenth siege, assisted by the French.

Several notorious oppressions have been committed by our military government of Gibraltar, who used to exact, and do what they pleased, the parliament, after a narrow inspection into the affair, have erected the town into a body corporate, the civil power being now lodged in its magistrates. It lies 40 miles S. W. of Cadiz, and 80 S. of Saville. Lat. 36, 21, N. Long. 6, 15, W.

GIBRALTAR, a village of the Terra Firma of South America, on the eastern bank of Teracabo bay, and near its bottom. In its neighbourhood is excellent cocoa, plenty of tobacco, and sugar-canes. The country round it is plain, and watered by several fine rivers. It abounds in fish, and all kinds of provisions. But in the rainy season the climate is unhealthy. The place is defended by a small fort; notwithstanding which, and the encroachments the Spaniards had made, the buccaneers from Jamaica under Morgan, took, plundered, and burnt it, in the year 1669. It lies about 30 miles from the mouth of the river Marabaco to the N. E.

GIEN, in Latin Castrum Giumum, a small city of Gastinois and Orleanois, in France, upon the river Loire, over which is a stone bridge. Here is a collegiate church.

GIENGEN, a small imperial town of Germany, in Suabia, seated on the river Brentz, between Ulm and Nörtingen. Long. 10, 27, E. Lat. 48, 38, N.

GIENZOR, a town of Africa, in Barbary, and in the kingdom of Tripoli, from the chief city of which it is 10 miles.

GIERACE, an episcopal town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Calabria, seated on a mountain near the sea, 32 miles N. E. of Reggio, and 27 S. E. of Nicotera. Long. 16, 43, E. Lat. 38, 15, N.

GIESSEN, a town of Upper Hesse, in Germany, on the Lahn or Lhane. It has a strong wall and regular fortifications, four gates, and as many streets, with a large square in the center. Its ditch is an hour's walk in circuit. Here is but one church, with a high steeple, and a good ring of bells. The governor resides in the castle at the E. end of the town. Here is kept a fair between Easter and Ascension day, that lasts for a week. In the neighbourhood are several castles or gentlemen's seats. It lies 28 miles N. of Frankfort. Lat. 50, 56, N. Long. 8, 51, E.

GIGAILA, or GIGAY, one of the Western Isles of Scotland, formerly in the diocese, and still in the sheriffdom of Argyle. It is six miles long, and a mile and a half broad. In it is a church. Upon the stones here grows a sort of moss or scurf, called corkir, which dyes crimson; and crofil, which dyes a feuillemort colour. The soil here is good both for pasture and corn, as oats and barley. And there is a medicinal well in this isle, which the natives, who are Protestants, reckon a Catholican, and have several legendary traditions about it. It lies about four miles W. from Kintyre. It produces no wood above a few juniper bushes.

GIGLIO, anciently Ægilum or Igilum, of which its present name, signifying a lily, is a corruption, though no ways correspondent with it, being a mountainous, and almost desert island, in the Tuscan sea, near Sardinia, in Italy. Upon it is only one village and a few fishermen's huts, with an old castle to defend it against the corsairs. It is between six and seven miles in length, and belongs to the great duke of Tuscany. It lies 20 miles W. of Porto Hercole. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 11, 51, E.

GIGNAC, a town of France, in Languedoc, and in the diocese of Montpellier, seated near the river Eraud. Long. 3, 40, E. Lat. 43, 45, N.

GIHON, a river of Asia, which by ancient writers was mistaken for the river Oxus, and is universally affirmed to fall into the Caspian sea. This indeed is true of the real river Oxus, which runs between the Caspian sea and the lake Aral; but as for the river Gihon, it could have no such course, for there are now only two rivers that come from the eastward, one called the Sir, or Sihun, and the other the Arx, both which fall into the lake Aral, which see.

GIJON, the Arae Sestinae of the Romans, on account of three altars dedicated to Augustus. It was once the capital of Asturias, in Spain, and the seat of the famous Pelajo or Pelagus, who so valiantly repulsed the Moors, and was the first Christian king after their invasion of Spain. It lies on a plain near the sea, has a good wall, castle, castle, and port, with about 400 houses, all within one parish.

GILAN, or GHILAN, a province of Persia, in Asia, which, together with Tabristan or Mazanderan and Afterbat, made up the ancient Hircania. It has the Caspian or Hircanian sea and Tabristan on the E. Persian Irak on the S. Aiderbeitzan on the W. and the heath of Mockan on the N. It is extremely well situated, having the sea on one side, and on the other high mountains; by which it is so well separated from all the rest of Persia, as to have no entrance into it that way but by very narrow passes. Towards Persia these mountains are frightful ruins and precipices; but towards Gilan, the descent is covered with lemon, orange, olive, fig, and many other fruit-trees. They abound with game, bears, wolves, leopards, and tigers. Gilan extends itself from the mouth of the river Isporuth up to the heath or waste of Mochan, which is the western part of Aiderbeitzan. It is a very beautiful and even country, and watered by several fine rivers, issuing on all sides from the mountains, and running into the Caspian sea, which on the coast of Gilan abounds with fish, as do its rivers; from the fishery of both a considerable revenue arises to the crown of Persia. Ditches are dug every where to drain the marsh-lands towards the sea: and the late Abbas the Great made a causeway eight feet above the level of the ground across the whole country, the roads before that time being almost impassable.

This province is the most fruitful in all Persia, producing silk, oil, wine, rice, tobacco, and all sorts of the best fruits so exuberantly, as to supply a great part of the empire, and even several foreign countries. In many parts of it are whole forests of mulberry, box, and walnut tree, of which woods most of their household furniture is made.

Of the same name is a city which lies 255 miles W. of Afterabat, and 34 N. of Ispahan.

GILERHILL, in Hampshire, near Winton, with a fair on Sept. 12.

GILFORD, a town in the county of Down, in Ireland, on the river Bane, over which is a stone bridge. The windings of this river, with the rising grounds about covered with some wood, as also the many bleaching fields in the bottoms, yield a very pleasant prospect. It lies four miles from Waringstown; and about a mile from hence is the New canal.

GILLENGEN, a town of Wirtemberg, in Suabia, in Germany. It lies near the Neckar, where was the general rendezvous of the duke of Marlborough's army, after the memorable march from the Netherlands into Germany, in the year 1704, before the battle of Hochstet. It lies 15 miles S. W. of Hailbron. Lat. 49, 12, N. Long. 9, 10, E.

GILLES, a town of France, in Lower Languedoc, with two large priories of Malta; and with a chapter, whose head has the title of abbot. It is 12 miles W. of Arles, and 27 N. E. of Montpellier. Long. 4, 33, E. Lat. 43, 40, N.

GILLICRANKY, a pass in Athol, one of the subdivisions of Perthshire, in the N. of Scotland. This pass lies at the foot of very high mountains, covered with some wood on the N. W. side, and about a mile or better in length; the road is narrow and dangerous, as the river Timel runs through a deep hollow close to it. From the mountains all around flow streams of the purest water; and the variety of prospects here is very surprising. This pass is about 12 miles from Dunkeld.

GILLINGHAM, a village of Dorsetshire, six miles N. W. of Shaftesbury, with two fairs on Trinity-Monday, and Sept. 1.

GILLYFREE, a large town on the river Gambia, in Negroland, Africa. It lies a little below James-fort, and inhabited by Portuguese, Mundingoos, and some Mahometans, the latter having a pretty little mosque here. The African company have a factory here very pleasantly situated, facing the fort, and likewise some gardens, which furnish them with greens, &c. This town used to supply all private shipping with linguists, or interpreters, till, in the year 1733, the king of Barrah made it no less than slavery for any of his people to serve in that capacity on board vessels, but what paid his customs, and traded in his country.

GILOLO, one of the Molucca islands, and the largest of them, in the Indian or Eastern ocean, Asia. The equinoctial line divides it in the middle. It has the Philippine isles to the N. the ocean to the E. the islands of Ceram, Amboyna, and the Banda isles, to the S. and the Moluccas, with the isle of Celebes, to the W. Its South part is called Batta-China. The whole island is 190 miles from N. to S. and 110 from E. to W. though some make it 250 leagues in circuit, much indented by bays. The produce is rice and sago, without any cloves, mace, or nutmegs, though very near the Molucca and Banda isles, which produce those spices. The air is unhealthy. Here are abundance of tortoises and small lizards.

GIMONT, a town of France, in Gascony, and in Lomagne, with an abbey, seated on the river Gironde. Long. 1, 5, E. Lat. 43, 40, N.

GINGEN, or GIENGEN, an imperial city of Suabia, in Germany. It lies on the river Brentz, which supplies it with excellent fish, and in a fruitful and pleasant country. It suffered much by fire, and and the long wars before the peace of Westphalia. The inhabitants are Lutherans. Near this place the duke of Marlborough joined prince Lewis of Baden, after his glorious march from the Netherlands in the year 1704. It lies 19 miles N. of Ulm, and the same S. of Nordlingen. Lat. 48, 41, N. Long. 10, 15, E.

GINGER-ISLAND, one of the smaller Virgin Isles, situated between the Round Rocks on the N. and Cooper's Isle on the S. between which is the King's Channel. Long. 62, 53. Lat. 18, 5.

GINGI, (principality of,) in the Hither India, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It is bounded by Bijnagar to the N. the mountains of Ballagata to the W. has the sea on the E. and the principality of Tanjour on the S. It extends itself 160 miles from E. to W. and 80 in breadth. The country abounds in rice, salt, and fruits, but overstocked with inhabitants, that they are obliged to have provisions from other countries. Its principal manufactures are linen and woollen stuffs, exported to other parts of the Indies; and they import spices, sandal-wood, Chinese silks, velvets, satins, embroidered carpets, raw silks, patana girdles, musk, quicksilver, brass, tin, lead, and copper. Its prince is tributary to the great mogul.

GINGI, or CHENGIER, the capital of the last-mentioned principality of the former name. It is a large and populous city, fortified by walls and strong castles on rocks almost inaccessible. Here are two stately palaces belonging to the prince. It lies in a pleasant valley on the N. side of a fine river, near the Coromandel coast, about 40 miles W. of Fort St. David's. Lat. 11, 36, N. Long. 79, 42, E.

GINGIRO, one of the six subdivisions of Monemugi, in Africa. It is a potent sovereignty, lying between Narca, the most southern kingdom of Abyssinia, Makoko, and Cambate, N. and E. of the first of them, and W. of the latter. The great river Zebec, which runs down into Makoko, almost encompasses it. The king is elective, and his palace is no better than a cottage, which when he dies is burnt, and his successor has a new one built for him, which is dedicated with the blood of two or three men of a certain family, which on that account are free from all other duties, these being so heavy as to render these barbarous compositions acceptable; for when the king buys any thing of foreign merchants, he pays them with the sons or daughters of any family, which he takes at pleasure without contradiction.

GIODDA, or GEDDAH, a sea-port town, on the eastern coast of the Red sea, in Arabia. It is looked upon as the port of Mecca, and carries on a great trade. Long. 40, 25, E. Lat. 22, 0, N.

GIOVANNI, (castel di S.) a small fortified place of Placentia, in Upper Italy. It lies on the river Tidone, 12 miles W. of Placentia city. Lat. 45, 12, N. Long. 9, 1, E.

GIOVENAZZE, a small city of the Terra de Bari, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, on the Adriatic sea. It is the see of a bishop; 14 miles W. of Bari. Lat. 41, 21, N. Long. 17, 28, E.

GIPPING, a river in Suffolk, which runs into the Orwell below Stow.

GIRACE, the see of a bishop, called Hieracienfis, or De Sancta Cyriaca, under that of Reggio. It lies in the Further Calabria, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, on a hill upon the coast of the Ionian sea, near a small river. Here are sulphurous baths. Its situation is between Cape Spartivento to the S. and Stilo to the N. 40 miles N. E. of Reggio. Lat. 38, 41, N. Long. 16, 42, E.

GIREFT, a large town of Asia, in Kerman, whose trade consists in wheat and dates. Long. 57, 55. Lat. 27, 30, N.

GIRGE, a city of Upper Egypt, in Africa, and the capital of Said or Thebais. It lies on the W. side of the Nile, about a quarter of a mile from it, is pretty well built, and near two miles in circuit. Here the Turkish sangiac, or governor resides. It lies near the side of the ancient Thebes, 238 miles N. of Grand Cairo. Lat. 26, 15, N. Long. 32, 12, E.

GIROMANI, a place in Alsace, now a province belonging to France, where are mines of silver, copper, and lead. They produce annually 106,000 marks of silver, and 24,000 pounds weight of copper.

GIRONA, anciently Gerunda, seems to retain something of the name of the fabulous tyrant Gerion, an old fortified town of Catalonia in Spain, the ancient metropolis of the Antheani. It lies along the side of a hill on the little river Onhar, which not far from it falls into the Ter, the latter washing its walls. It is the see of a bishop, the cathedral, bishop's palace, and tower of Gironela, stand on the top of the hill. The episcopal revenue is 8000 ducats; the high altar is of curious workmanship. The number of inhabitants is about 2500 families in three parishes, with nine monasteries, four nunneries, and a good hospital. Here a council was held in 517. The French took it in 1694, but restored it by the peace of Ryswick in 1697. The Miguelers took it by stratagem for Charles III. in September 1705, but the French re-took it in 1711. Here is a small university. It lies 17 miles W. of the sea, and 52 N. E. of Barcelona. Lat. 42, 12, N. Long. 2, 50, E.

GIRONS, a town of France, in Conserans, seated on the river Salat, 3 miles S. of St. Lizier. Several Several fairs are kept here, where they sell great numbers of cattle and mules. Long. 1, 10, E. Lat. 42, 58, N.

GISBORNE, a market town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and confines of Lancashire, on the river Ribble, a little below Settle, 54 miles from York, and 220 from London.

GISBOROUGH, a market town in Cleveland, and the North Riding of Yorkshire. It lies upon a rising ground, yet defended from the sea breezes by intermediate hills. The soil about it bears plenty of grass and flowers the greatest part of the year. It lies four miles from the mouth of the river Tees, where a bay and harbour are formed for shipping. Here was anciently a beautiful rich abbey and church, which from its ruins seems to have equalled the best cathedral. Camden prefers Gisborough for health and pleasure to Puteoli in the kingdom of Naples. In the neighbourhood are veins of iron and allum mines: the latter were once very considerable, 800 men having been constantly employed about them, by Sir Paul Pindar, who paid for rent near 15,000 l. The price then was 26 l. per ton, so that his profits were very great: but this trade is since removed to Whitby. On the coast are red and yellowish stones, in taste and smell resembling copperas, nitre, and brimstone; and on the rocks at Huntcliff, bare at low water, are vast herds of sea-calves or seals. Its weekly market is on Monday, and annual fairs are kept on the third Monday and Tuesday after April 11, Tuesday in Whitsun-week, August 26 and 27, Sept. 19 and 20, and the first Monday after Nov. 11. It lies 39 miles from York, and 247 from London.

GISORS, the capital of those called the seven large districts of Normandy, in France. It is a neat and populous city, divided into two parts by the river Epte, which washes part of its walls, and fills its ditches. Here is but one parochial church, which is a very fine structure. It has three convents of monks, four of nuns, three suburbs, and a castle. Here is the seat of a royal bailiwick, provostship of the marshals of France, a salt-granary, and election comprehending 52 parishes. Here is also a governor, a criminal judge, a mayor, three eschevins or aldermen, a town-house, two hospitals, and a college. In the neighbourhood are large fields producing abundance of corn. It lies 32 miles S. E. of Rouen. Lat. 49, 36, N. Long. 1, 56, E.

GISSING, a village in Norfolk, with a fair on July 25.

GIUDGUO, a fortress on the N. side of the Danube, which was taken by the Russians, and re-taken by the Turks in 1771.

Vol. I.—No. 49.

GIVET, St. HILLAIRE, a town of Namur, in the Netherlands, at the bottom of a hill, separated by the river Maes, from Givet-notre-dame, and both regularly fortified by M. Vauban, belonging to the crown of France. These two are properly parts of Charlmont, which was also strongly fortified by the same engineer; but the latter was ceded to the emperor by the treaty of Utrecht. Givet St. Hilaire lies 25 miles S. of Namur. Lat. 50, 24, N. Long. 4, 56, E.

GIVIRA, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, and in the county of Anghiera, seated on a lake of the same name, eight miles from Anghiera.

GIULA NOVA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Abruzzo, seated on the Gulph of Venice, and has the title of a duchy.

GIULA, by the Hungarians called Gwya, a small, but strong town of Upper Hungary. It lies on a peninsula in the lake Zarked, near the river Feketekeres. In 1566, the Turks took it, mortgaged it to a prince of Transylvania, redeemed it, and kept it till 1695, when the Imperialists recovered it, and, with the rest of Hungary, it was secured to them by the treaty of Carlowitz. In 1703 the Hungarian malecontents invested it to no purpose. It lies 61 miles N. W. of Temeswaer. Lat. 46, 47, N. Long. 21, 55, E.

GIURGEVO, a strong town, situated near the Danube, in Valachia, and which was taken by the Turks in 1771. The Russians attacked it the same year, but were obliged to retire.

GIUSTENDIL, anciently Lychnidus, a large trading town of Macedonia, in European Turkey. It lies 48 miles E. of Nyssa. Lat. 42, 52, N. Long. 24, 12, E.

GLZE, (old city of,) now a village, contiguous to Grand Cairo, in Upper Egypt, in Africa, supposed to be the site of the ancient Memphis, and on the same side where the pyramids are.

GLAMORGANSHIRE, in South Wales. It is bounded on the S. and part of the W. by Bristol channel, on the N. W. by Caermarthenshire, on the N. by Brecknockshire, and on the E. by Monmouthshire; it extends 48 miles in length from E. to W. 27 in breadth from N. to S. and 116 in circumference. It is divided into 10 hundreds, in which are one city, seven market towns, 118 parishes, about 10,000 houses, and 58,000 inhabitants. It is in the diocese of Landaff. This county, in the time of the Romans, was part of the district inhabited by the Silures, and had several Roman stations. Thus Boverton, a few miles to the S. of Cowbridge, is supposed to be the Bovium of Antoninus; Neath to be his Nidum, and Lloghor, to the W. of Swansea, to be his Leucarum.

G L

Leucarum. The principal rivers of this county are the Rhymny, the Taff, the Ogmore, the Avon, the Cleddagh, and the Tawe. The air, in the S. part, towards the sea, is temperate and healthful; but the northern part, which is mountainous, is cold and piercing, full of thick woods, extremely barren, and thin of inhabitants; but the mountains serve to feed herds of cattle, and send forth streams which add greatly to the fertility of the other parts of the county. Indeed, between the mountains, there are some fertile vallies, which afford good pasture; for the level part being more capable of cultivation, produces sweet grafs and pretty large crops of corn. The mountains yield coal and lead-ore; and the S. part is so remarkably fertile, pleasant and populous, that it is generally stiled the garden of Wales, but has no manufacture.

GLANDEVES, in Latin, Glandata, or Glanateva Capillatorum, an episcopal city, and once county of Provence, in France, on the Var, the continual overflowings of which river obliged the inhabitants, for above 800 years ago, to settle elsewhere, particularly at Entrevaux, where the bishop, who is a suffragan of Ambrun, now resides, though he still retains the title of Glandeves; of the old city there only remains a fortress on a hill, and the bishop's palace. Glandeves gives name to one of the most illustrious families of Provence, which re-established the bishopric, after the Saracens had abolished it in the 10th century. It lies 32 miles N. W. of Nice. Lat. 43, 51, N. Long. 6, 56, E.

GLANDORE-HARBOUR, in the county of Cork, in Ireland, near Castle-haven, though small, is a good harbour.

GLARIS, one of the cantons of Switzerland, in Latin, Pagus Glarenensis, or Vallis Glarona. It is bounded on the E. partly by the Grisons, and partly by the county of Sargans, to the N. by the bailiwick of Gaster, and the lake of Wahlstadt, to the W. by the cantons of Switz and Ury, to the S. partly by the canton of Ury, and partly by the Upper League of the Grisons. It is 25 miles from N. to S. and 18 from E. to W. But its dimensions are variously given. It consists of one large valley, and mountains lying entirely on the Alps; yet it is well watered with lakes and rivers, which abound in fish, while the valley produces corn, and the mountains pasture. But the inhabitants are forced to have other necessities from their neighbours. Their government is democratical. Though the Protestants and Papists, are intermixed here, and do not live in separate quarters, as in the canton of Appenzel; yet they are peaceable enough among one another; divine service in both communions being alternately performed in the same churches, after each other, without the least disturbance. But the Protestants are by much the most powerful and numerous part, the Papists being not the tenth, perhaps the twentieth part of this canton, though the latter proposed that the country should be divided between them, as in the canton of Appenzel; but the former resolved rather to die, than to suffer it, and the Protestant cantons sided with them. At last this happy temperament was agreed on, that in all suits of law betwixt those of different professions, two-thirds of the judges should always be of the religion of the defendant. By a treaty of co-burghership, this canton is co-arbitrator with that of Schwitz, in any differences arising between the abbot of St. Gall, and his subjects of Tocken-burg, and has a joint power with it over Urenach and Gussal. In all spiritual causes, as marriages, &c. the Protestants of Glaris apply to the consistory of Zurich. This country, though situated in the bosom of high mountains, is subject to frequent earthquakes: so that from April 1701, to January 1703, there happened no less than 37 shocks in it. This canton is subdivided into the Upper, Lower, and Middle quarters, in which are several excellent baths of mineral waters.

GLARIS, the capital of the last-mentioned canton, of the same name, is a large town, lying about the middle of the country, on the river Linth or Limath. Here are two churches, the streets large, and the houses fair and well-built. The general assemblies of the cantons are holden here always, the first Sunday of May, when all males from 16 to 60 are obliged to attend, and are sworn. This town lies in the middle quarter, 20 miles N. E. of Altorff, and S. E. of Schwitz. Lat. 47, 0, N. Long. 9, 8, E.

GLASGOW, a large, well-built, cleanly, genteel town of Lanarkshire or Clydesdale in Scotland; and next to Edinburgh, the chief place in the kingdom, for extent, buildings, trade, riches, and its elegance in general. It is delightfully situated on the side of a hill, sloping towards the E. bank of the Clyde, but one third of the city lying low and next the river, is sometimes subject to its inundations.

About the year 1750, a very considerable change took place in the manner of living among the inhabitants of Glasgow. Till this time, an attentive industry, and a frugality bordering upon parsimony, had been their general characteristic; the severity of the ancient manners prevailed in its full vigour; but now, when an extensive commerce and increased manufactures had produced wealth, the ideas of the people were enlarged, and schemes of trade and improvement were adopted, which people people would formerly have been denominated madmen if they had undertaken; a new stile was introduced in living, dress, building, and furniture, wheel-carriages were set up, public places of entertainment were frequented, and an assembly-room, ball-room, and play-house, were built by subscription; and from this time we may date all the improvements that have taken place, not only in Glasgow, but all over the west of Scotland. The best method, however, of estimating the growing improvement of any town, is by the frequency of their application for assistance to parliament; we shall therefore enumerate the acts of parliament which have been passed in favour of the city of Glasgow since the year 1750.

In 1753, an act passed for repairing several roads leading into the city of Glasgow. In 1756, an act for erecting and supporting a light-house in the island of Little Cumray, at the mouth of the Clyde, and for rendering the navigation of the frith and river more safe and commodious. In 1759, an act for improving the navigation of the river Clyde, to the city of Glasgow, and for building a bridge across the river from the city to the village of Gorbells. In 1767, the people of Glasgow having proposed to make a small cut or canal from the frith of Forth to that of Clyde, for the conveniency of their trade to the eastern side of the island, several gentlemen at Edinburgh, and throughout different parts of the kingdom, proposed that this canal should be executed upon a much larger scale than what had been originally projected. An act was accordingly obtained, and the canal executed. In 1770, another was obtained for improving the navigation of the river, and for building the bridge from the city to the village of Gorbells, being an amendment of the former act for that purpose. In 1771, an act for making and widening a passage from the salt-market to St. Andrew's church; for enlarging and completing the church-yard of that church, and likewise for building a convenient exchange or square in the city; also for amending and explaining the former act relative to the navigation of the Clyde. An act for making and maintaining a navigable canal and waggon-way from the collieries in the parishes of Old and New Monkland, to the city of Glasgow.

This last canal, which was undertaken with a view to reduce the price of coals, has not been attended with the desired effect. The other improvements have been productive of very great advantages, and it may be confidently asserted, that since the year 1750, a total change has been effected in the city of Glasgow and all round it; the manners of the people have undergone an alteration greatly for the better; a spirit of industry and activity has been raised, and now pervades every order of men; commerce has been increased, manufactures carried on to a considerable extent, and still encreasing; every person is employed; not a beggar is to be seen in the streets; the very children are busy.

Such is the present flourishing state of the city of Glasgow, which for its beauty and elegance exceeds every other city in Scotland. The most ancient part of it stands on a rising ground. The foundation of the cathedral is 104 feet higher than the bed of the river, and the descent from the high ground reaches to about 100 yards below the college. The rest of the city is built upon a plain. The city reaches from N. to S. that is, from the Stable-green port, to the south end of the Gorbells, 2000 yards; from E. to W. that is, from the Gallowgate toll-bar, to Grahamestown toll-bar, 3160 yards. The streets are clean and well-paved, the medium breadth of the middle ones is 50 feet; and several of them intersecting one another at right angles, produce a very fine effect. The houses, excepting a very few, are built of free-stone well hewed; few of them exceed four floors in height; and many of them are in an exceeding good taste, inasmuch that Mr. Pennant pronounces Glasgow to be the best second-rate city he had ever seen. The most remarkable public buildings are, the cathedral, St. Andrew's church, the college, the town-house, the assembly-hall, the guild-hall, the guard-house, the herb-market, two stone-bridges, and four hospitals. Here are silk, linen, cotton, and woollen manufactures; types for printing, and printing is also carried on here in great perfection. The trade of this city with America for tobacco, was very considerable before the troubles, and they now carry on a great foreign trade, and export great quantities of salmon.

The government of the city of Glasgow is vested in a provost and three bailies, a dean of guild, deacon-conveener, and a treasurer, with a common council of 13 merchants and 13 mechanics. The provost, and two of the bailies must, by the set of the burgh, be elected from the merchant rank, and the other bailie from the trades rank, that is, the mechanics. The provost is, from courtesy and custom, styled lord provost. He is properly lord of the police of the city, president of the community, and is ex officio a justice of the peace for both the burgh and county.

The revenue of Glasgow amounts to about 60000l. sterling per annum: it arises from a duty upon all grain and meal brought into the city, (this tax is denominated the lallies,) from the rents of lands and houses the property of the community; from an impost of two pennies Scots upon every Scots pint of ale or beer brewed, inbrought, or sold within the city; from certain dues payable out of the the markets; from the rents of the seats in churches, from the dues of cramage at the quay, at the weigh-house, tonnage on the river, pontage on the bridge, statute-work within the burgh, &c. The number of inhabitants is computed to be about 43,000.

This city formerly sent a member to the Scottish parliament; but since the Union it has been joined with Renfrew, Rutherglen, and Dumbarton, which district of royal boroughs send but one member to the British parliament alternately.

Glasgow lies 25 miles N. W. of Lanerk, and 42 W. of Edinburg. Lat. 55. 56. N. Long. 4. 12. W.

GLASHITTEN, so called by the Germans, but Teplitz by the Hungarians, a town of Upper Hungary, where was a rich gold-mine formerly. The place is much resorted to for its hot baths, over which are handsome structures. Among them is a sweating-bath; their hot springs from it draining through a hill, fall into a bagnio, at one end of which is a stove heated by the steam of those waters, and of different degrees of heat according to the higher or lower seats. The springs being 40 or 50 in number, are transparent, yield silver, have a red and green sediment strongly incrusting the seats under water. It lies about seven miles from Schemnitz.

GLASSEN BURY, a town in Hertford county, Connecticut, about one mile E. of the Connecticut river, four miles S. E. of Wetherfield, and eight miles N. E. of Hadham.

GLASTONBURY, Somersetshire, 126 miles from London, is in a manner encompassed with rivers, and was of old called the Isle of Avalon. By the ruins, here appears to have been the most magnificent abbey in the world, and the abbot lived in almost as much state as the royal donors, with an income of 40,000l. a year, and a vast tract of rich land, which he could see from the Tor, in his own possession, exclusive of seven deer parks belonging to his abbey, which is walled round, a mile in compass, and was rated in the king's books, at 700l. a year more than the archbishopric of Canterbury, and 2000l. a year more than the bishopric of Durham. The abbot had the title of lord, and sat among the barons in parliament. There were 61 abbots who governed it successively, for near 600 years, and had such power, by a grant from king Canute the Dane, that without their leave, no person whatever, not even a bishop or prince durst set a foot in the island of Avalon. Richard Whiting, who was the last abbot, for refusing to surrender his abbey to king Henry VIII. &c. was condemned at Wells, and carried, with two of his monks, on a hurdle to the Tor, where he was hanged in his pontificalibus on St. Michael's tower; his head set on the gate of his abbey, and his quarters disposed of at Bath, Wells, Bridgewater, and Ilchester. This Tor, so called from the tower which stands on it, is a hill so high, that it is an excellent sea mark.

Edgar and many other Saxon kings, were interred in its abbey-church, as was also in Mr. Camden's opinion, king Arthur. Every cottage here has part of a pillar, a door, or a window of this fabric; of which there still remain the ruins of the choir, the middle tower, and chapels. There is nothing left entire of the abbot's lodging, but the kitchen, which was built by one of the abbots, of stone, without any combustible material. The walls that remain of the abbey are overgrown with ivy, and the aspect of the whole is both melancholy and venerable. Here are two parish churches. This town while under the protection of its abbots, was a parliamentary borough, but it lost that and its privilege of a corporation, the latter of which was, however, restored by queen Anne, who granted it a new charter, for a mayor and burgesses. The only manufactory here is stockings, but the chief support of the place is the resort of people to see the ruins of the abbey. The George inn here was formerly called the Abbot's inn; because it was a receptacle for the strollers that came in pilgrimage to the abbey. The market here is on Tuesdays, and the fair on Sept. 8. At a little distance from the old church and facing the monks church yard, are two remarkable pyramids, with inscriptions, that are in characters unintelligible, and an image in bishop's vestments. Here is a chalybeate spring.

GLATZ, a neat compact city of Bohemia, and the capital of a county of its name, on the Mers or Mira, at the foot of a hill confining on Silesia. Here is a castle on a rock almost inaccessible, which surrendered to the king of Prussia in 1742, and with the country was ceded to him afterwards by the treaty of Breslau. Its trade is in silver-ore, iron, timber, coals, venison, cattle, butter and cheese. The great church here was formerly a pagan temple. The town has good suburbs, and a neat town-house, but the place suffered much in the civil wars of Bohemia. It lies 112 miles E. of Prague. Lat. 50. 36. N. Long. 16. 21. E.

GLATZ, (county or circle of,) in which is its capital, of the same name just mentioned. It contains nine great towns and 100 villages, and is said to bring in some years a revenue of 40,000 crowns. As it lies among the mountains of Moravia, with this latter country to the S. Silesia to the E. and Bohemia to the W. and N. Geographers are at a loss to which country to assign it. The king of Prussia possesses it by virtue of conquest, and a subsequent treaty at Breslau, with the queen of Hungary confirming it to him. In 1622, the Lutherans

Lutherans were expelled the town and county of Glatz, and the parochial church given to the Catholics, but since restored. In one of its two towers is a bell weighing 109 quintals.

GLEMISFORD, a village in Suffolk, between Lenham and Clare, with two charity-schools and a fair June 24.

GLENCAIRN, a market-town of Dumfriesshire, in the S. of Scotland. It lies 11 miles from the tower of Dumfries, and 56 from Edinburgh.

GLENCO, a scattered village of Lochaber, one of the districts of Inverness-shire, in the N. of Scotland; noted for an inhuman massacre committed here by king William's soldiers, who cut off man, woman, and child, excepting one that carried off an infant, who was the heir of Glenco. Glenco lies not a great way from Innerlochy or Fort William, and Maryburgh, and between 50 and 60 miles W. of Inverness.

GLENCOWEN, a river in Cumberland, which runs into the Ulles-water, on the S.

GLENELG, a small district of Kintail, a subdivision of Ross-shire, in the N. of Scotland, lying in the S. W. part of the county, in this tract is Glenshiells. Here the government have built a fort, and keep in it always a few companies of men. Glenelg, including Moror Knoydart, is a parish in the presbytery of Gairloch, 24 miles in length, and 18 in breadth. In it is also an arm of the sea, about eight miles long, dividing Glenelg from Knoydart.

GLENGARY, Camden's Garrow, or Glengarrow, a neck of land, about eight miles long, separating the Aberlough from Lough-nefs, in the shire of Inverness and N. of Scotland.

GLENLUCE, (bay of,) a large gulph on the south side of the Mull of Galloway, in the south of Scotland, running between the points of the Mull and Whitherne or Burroughhead, being directly opposite to the Isle of man. Hereabouts is a good herring-fishery in the season, and an excellent road for shipping, both in the bay of Glenluce, and the opposite bay of Lochrain, separated by a neck of land only six miles broad, which joins the Rinnes or peninsula of Galloway to the mainland of Scotland; but the country has no trade.

GLENSHIELL, a valley of Kintail, which is a district in the S. W. part of Ross-shire, famous for a battle or hot skirmish, fought there on the 10th of June, 1719. Glenshiell, lying W. of Inverness about 40 miles, is a parish, in the Presbytery of Gairloch, 18 miles long, with 500 examinable persons, few Papists, and three preaching places.

GLISS, or GLISA, a village of Upper Valais, an ally of the Swiss cantons. It lies within a mile of Brieg. In the neighbourhood are the remains of an ancient wall, with several towers drawn from the Rhone to the top of the adjacent mountains. It is supposed to have been built by the Romans; others by the Viberi, as a barrier against the Seduni.

GLOCESTER, a county and town in West Jersey, not above four miles from Philadelphia, on the river Delawar.

GLOCESTER, a maritime town in the county of Essex, in Massachusetts-bay, New England. It is situated on the isthmus of the peninsula that forms cape Anne.

GLOCESTER, a maritime town in Gloucester county, in Virginia, on a point of land on the N. side of York river, which is defended by a fort opposite York city.

GLOCESTER, in Gloucestershire, 102 miles from London, stands on a pleasant hill, with houses on every descent, and is a clean, well-built town, with the Severn on one side, a branch of which brings up ships to it. It is beautified with a cathedral, besides five parish churches, and is exceedingly well provided with hospitals, particularly an infirmary, after the manner of those at London, Winchester, Bath, &c. It was a Roman colony, and governed by a consul. Forging of iron seems to have been its manufactory so early as the time of William the Conqueror; king Henry VIII. made it the see of a bishop, with a dean and six prebends. Its castle, which was erected in the time of William the Conqueror, is very much decayed; part of it is leased out by the crown, and the rest serves for a prison. In its cathedral, which is an ancient, but magnificent, fabric, and has a tower, reckoned one of the neatest and most curious pieces of architecture in England, are the tombs of Robert duke of Normandy, son to William the Conqueror, and of Edward II. and there is a whispering-place like to that at St. Paul's at London. In the chapter-house Strongbow lies, who conquered Ireland. There are 12 chapels in it, with the arms and monuments of many great persons. Edward the Confessor had a great assembly of his nobles in that part of the monastery now called the long work-house. King John made it a borough, to be governed by two bailiffs. Henry III. who was crowned here, made it a corporation. By its present charter from Charles II. it is governed by a steward, who is generally a nobleman, a mayor, recorder, 12 aldermen, out of whom the mayor is chosen, a town-clerk, two sheriffs, chose yearly out of 26 common council-men, a sword-bearer, and four serjeants at mace. Here are 12 incorporated incorporated trading companies, whose masters attend the mayor on all public occasions, &c, but one of its chief manufactories is pins. Here is a good stone bridge over the river, with a quay, wharf, and custom house; but most of its business is engrossed by Bristol. King Edward I. held a parliament here in 1272, wherein some good laws were made, now called the Statutes of Gloucester; he erected a gate on the S. side of the abbey, still called by his name, though almost demolished in the civil wars. King Richard II. also held a parliament here; and king Richard III. in consideration of his having (before his accession to the crown) born the title of duke of Gloucester, added the two adjacent hundreds of Dudston and King's-Barton to it, gave it his sword and cap of maintenance, and made it a county of itself, by the name of the county of the city of Gloucester. But after the Restoration the hundreds were taken away by act of parliament, and the walls pulled down, because the city shut the gates against Charles I. when he besieged it in 1643, by which, though the siege was raised by the earl of Essex, it had suffered 20,000l. damage. Before that time it had 11 parish churches, but six of them were then demolished. Here are abundance of crosses, and statues of our kings, some of whom kept their Christmas here; several market-houses supported with pillars, and large remains of monasteries, which were once so numerous, that it gave occasion to the monkish proverb, "As sure as God is in Gloucester." Here is a barley market, and a hall for the assizes, called the Booth-hall. Under the bridge is a water-engine to supply the town, and it is served with it also from Robin Hood's well, to which is a fine walk from the city. Camden says, that the famous Roman way, called Ermine Street, which begins at St. David's in Pembrokeshire, and reaches to Southampton, passes through this city. Sudmead in the neighbourhood is noted for horse-races. The markets here are on Wednesday and Sunday, and fairs April 5, July 5, September 28, and November 28. Here is a charity-school for above 80 children, of whom above 70 are also clothed.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE, or GLOUCESTER-SHIRE, an inland county of England. It is bounded on the E. by Warwickshire, Oxfordshire, and Berkshire; on the S. by Somersetshire and Wiltshire, on the N. by Worcestershire, and on the W. by Herefordshire and Monmouthshire. Templeman makes it 62 miles in length, and 36 in breadth; though others reckon its dimensions less. It contains one city, namely, that of its name, 27 market towns, and 280 parishes. The number of its inhabitants amounts to 162,568, who are represented by two knights of the shire, and two each for the city of Gloucester, the boroughs of Cirencester and Tewksbury. It is watered by several large rivers, as the Severn, the Wye, the Avon, the Isis, the Leden; the Frome, the Stroude, the Windrush, and several other smaller streams.

The air of this county is healthy throughout, but has a difference of soil, the eastern parts being hilly, the western woody, but the middle enriched with a pleasant and fruitful valley; which last is much indented by the Severn, washing this county for 40 miles together, (70, including its windings); so that it brings necessaries from abroad, and gives the means of conveying the native commodities into foreign parts. This river in some places is two or three miles broad, and comes in with a violent tide called the boar, which rolls with a head from two to four feet high, carrying every thing before it, and overflowing its banks. It is remarked, that the tides in it are largest one year at full moon, and next at the change; and likewise one year the night-tides are highest, and another those of the day.

It abounds with all sorts of grain, cattle, fowl, and game, with every thing that other counties produce, and as good in their kind, especially bacon and cider. And its rivers abound with fish, as salmon in the Severn, together with lampreys and conger eels.

Its usual division is into three parts; namely, 1. Cotswold. 2. The vale; and, 3. The forest of Dean.

Cotswould is the hilly part of Gloucestershire, on the confines of the shires of Warwick, Oxford, and Berks; though not very fertile in corn, yet feeds about 400,000 sheep, from some of which breed, made a present of by one of our English sheep-breeders to the king of Spain, is said to come originally the fine Spanish wool. The manufacturing of cloths here is very considerable.

The Vale is the middle part of the county, spreading itself into a fruitful plain on both sides of the Severn. In this part excellent cheese is made, which is the fattest and most agreeable of any in England, though that under this denomination in London comes mostly from Wiltshire, the real Gloucester cheese going more to Bristol.

The forest of Dean, which is the most westerly part, lies between the Severn and the Wye. It was formerly covered with wood to the extent of 30,000 acres, which was then such a receptacle for robbers, that in the reign of Henry VI. an act of parliament was made to suppress them. But since the discovery of rich iron ore, and forges set up to work it, the woods have been very much lessened by being cut down for that purpose, and several towns and villages built in the forest.

The oaks here are reckoned the best in England, with the timber of which most of our shipping were formerly built. The king has a swainmot here for preserving the vert and venison; and the miners too have a court for preventing encroachments upon one another, and encouraging them to go on quietly in their labour, in digging after coals and iron ore, with both which this forest abounds. Every miner is sworn by touching the Bible, it is said, with a stick, and that lest they defile holy writ with unclean hands; and when they are to give evidence they wear a particular cap: two whimsical, if not ridiculous, customs! This whole county lies in the diocese of the bishop of Gloucester.

GLOCESTER-ISLAND, one of the new discoveries, in 1767 by captain Wallis in the South sea; but as it was surrounded with rocks and breakers, he did not land. It was visited by captain Cartaret the same year, who supposes them to be the same land which was seen by Quiros. Lat. 19, 11, S. Long. 140, 6, W.

GLOGAU, a duchy of Lower Silesia, in Germany. It lies on the confines of Poland. In it are about eleven small towns, besides its capital; but it was formerly of a much greater extent, including the duchies of Sagan, Crossen, and some other districts. Here they have a law contrary to the general custom in the empire, that, upon failure of male issue, a daughter inherits before any other of the father's male relations.

GLOGAU the Great, in contradistinction from another small town in the duchy of Oppelen, the capital of the last-mentioned duchy of its name. It stands on the river Oder, near the Polish frontiers. Its name in Wendish signifies copses or thickets, as being situated among them. It is regularly fortified with a double wall and ditch, having a strong castle; but in 1741 the king of Prussia took both by storm. He made the garrison, consisting of above 1000 men, prisoners of war; found the military chest here, with above 32,000 florins; 50 pieces of brass cannon; and a large quantity of powder. This capture was afterwards confirmed to him by a subsequent treaty with the queen of Hungary. The neighbouring territory abounds with corn and cattle, the Oder and numerous ponds supplying it with plenty of fish; and the air here is sweeter than at Breslaw: though it is said, that eating too much salt beef, pork and cheese, with the immoderate use of beer, cause epidemic distempers, as the plague, gout, stone, &c. This city has five great gates and two small ones. Its cathedral or collegiate church, the principal ornament of the place, lies without the city, in an island formed by the Oder.

Its parochial church within the town is ancient, and has the largest and highest tower in all Silesia. Here are also three convents, besides some schools and a college. It lies 45 miles N. W. of Breslaw. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 16, 20, E.

GLOGAU the Less, a town of the duchy of Oppelen, in Silesia. It lies 28 miles N. of Troppau, and 56 S. of Breslaw; also in the possession of the king of Prussia, at the same time with the former. Lat. 50, 32, N. Long. 17, 36, E.

GLORIA, (San Jago de la) a large castle on the S. side of the harbour of Porto Bello, in South America, and opposite to the anchoring-place. To the E. of it, at the distance of about 100 toises, begins the last-mentioned town. Admiral Vernon demolished it.

GLOTTA, (island of,) the name given by Antoninus to the Isle of Arran, a subdivision of the shieriffdom of Bute, in the frith of Clyde and W. of Scotland. The river Clyde is also called Glotta.

GLUCKSTADT, a strongly fortified town of Holstein, in Germany, on the N. side of the river Elbe, near the influx of the rivulet Rhyn into it. The emperor Ferdinand II. besieged it two years in vain, principally owing to the assistance it had from the Danish fleet in the river, as it cannot be taken unless blocked up by a fleet. The Danes generally keep in it a garrison of 2000 foot; and on the ramparts are fine walks of trees. Here are several canals, one of which divides the town into two parts, and is intersected by another at the end of the market-place, which is very magnificent. At one corner is the great church, where the Calvinists and Papists have each a chapel. Its harbour can receive a royal navy, the Elbe being very wide here, deep, and safe. At the end of the canal running into it from the town, is a tower built in the water, on piles, round which are platforms, with batteries of cannon that command the Elbe. The town standing in a marshy bottom, there is no coming to it on the land-side, but by a stone causeway about three quarters of a mile in length, on the side of Krempe. It belongs to Denmark, whose sovereign attempting to oblige ships that pass up the Elbe to pay toll, was opposed by all the powers of Europe, particularly the Hamburgers. Though matters were accommodated, the duties were laid on; so that the toll of this river is engrossed by the king of Denmark at this town; and it was declared a free port in 1773. In this town thieves are condemned for life to draw the dust-carts, and are chained to them like Turkey galley-slaves. Between this and Elmsborn the country is rendered very fertile by frequent frequent inundations of the Elbe. It lies 28 miles W. of Hamburg. Lat. 54, 32, N. Long. 9, 12, E.

GNADENBERG, or the Hill of Grace, a town belonging to the jurisdiction of Newmark, in the Upper Palatinate of Bavaria, formerly noted for a monastery of the order of St. Salvator, one part of which is for monks, and another for nuns; with a magnificent church, and 36 altars. It embraced the Reformation. But since it has been restored to the Roman Catholics it has lost its former grandeur. It stands on the river Schwartzach, about half a German league from Altorff.

GNESNA, or GNIESNO, by the Germans called GNESSEN, the principal city of the circle of Kalisch, and the capital of Lower Poland. It lies about the middle of the Palatinate, in a plain between hills and lakes. Here the kings of Poland were crowned, and the regalia kept, till 1320, when removed to Cracow. In 1613 it suffered extremely by fire, and has been declining ever since. It is only considerable as being the see of an archbishop, who is primate of all Poland, and regent of the kingdom during an inter-regnum, with the state and revenues belonging to the crown. In the cathedral is a vast treasure of gold, silver, and curious enamelled vessels, with costly vestments, and archbishop Firley's mitre, valued at near 2000 l. sterling. Its gates of Corinthian brass, and finely wrought, formerly belonged to a Greek monastery in the Taurica Chersonesus. They were brought hither by king Boleslaus II. It lies 121 miles W. of Warsaw. Lat. 52, 41, N. Long. 17, 50, E.

GNIEW, or MEVE, a small town of Little Pomerania, in Polish Prussia; it lies near the junction of Ferfswitta with the Vistula. In 1463 it was obliged to surrender to the Poles, and in 1626 and 1655 to the Swedes. In modern times one Gerz, a Lutheran minister, was forced to erect a statue to St. Nepumuc, whom it was said he had calumniated.

GNOSSUS, or CERATUS, from a river so called, a town of Candia, an island of European Turkey, the royal seat of Minos, and where Jupiter's tomb was. Its situation is not certainly known, accounts varying about it. The Gnosian arrows are famous in antiquity.

GOA, a large and strong town of Asia, in the peninsula on this side the Ganges, and on the Malabar coast. It was taken by the Portuguese in 1508, and is the chief town of all the settlements the Europeans have in India. It stands in an island about 12 miles in length, and six in breadth, and the city is built on the north side of it, having the conveniency of a fine salt-water river, capable of receiving ships of the greatest burthen, where they lie within a mile of the town. The banks of the river are beautified with a great number of handsome structures, such as churches, castles, and gentlemen's houses. The air within the town is unwholesome, for which reason it is not so well inhabited now as formerly. The viceroy's palace is a noble building, and stands at a small distance from the river, over one of the gates of the city, which leads to a spacious street, terminated by a beautiful church. This city contains a great number of handsome churches, convents, and cloisters, with a stately large hospital; all well endowed, and kept in good repair. The marketplace takes up an acre of ground; and in the shops about it may be had the produce of Europe, China, Bengal, and other countries of less note. Every church has a set of bells, some of which are continually ringing. Their religion is the Roman Catholic, and they have a severe inquisition. There are a great many Indian converts, but they generally retain some of their old customs, particularly they cannot be brought to eat beef. However, there are many Gentoos in the city, who are tolerated, because they are more industrious than the Christians, and better artists. The clergy are very numerous, and illiterate; but the churches are finely embellished, and have great numbers of images. The houses are large, and make a fine shew; but within they are but poorly furnished. The inhabitants are contented with greens, fruits, and roots; which with a little bread, rice, and fish, is their principal diet, though they have hogs and fowls in plenty. However, they are very much addicted to women, and are generally weak, lean, and feeble. Captain Hamilton stood on a hill near the city, and counted above 80 churches, convents, and monasteries; and he was told that there were about 30,000 priests and monks. The body of St. Francis Xavier is buried in St. Paul's church, and, as they pretend, performs a great many miracles. It is remarkable, that none of the churches except one, have glass windows, for they make use of clear oyster-shells instead of glass, and all their fine houses have the same. Goa itself has few manufactures or productions, their best trade being in arrack. The river's mouth is defended by several forts and batteries, well planted with large cannon on both sides, and there are several other forts in different places. It is 250 miles N. by W. of Cochin. E. long. 74, 0, N. lat. 15, 31.

GOBCEIN, a town of the Palatinate, in Germany, 18 miles S. E. of Philipsburg. Lat. 49, 21, N. Long. 28, 31, E.

GOCH, a town in the duchy of Cleves, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany, nine miles S. of of Cleves-city, and subject to the Dutch. Lat. 51, 49, N. Long. 5, 51, N.

GOCIANO, a town of the island of Sardinia, in the province of Lugho-Dori; seated on the river Thurso, 25 miles E. of Alger; it has a castle, and is the capital of the county of the same name.

GODAH, a considerable town of Asia, in Indostan; but it is not so flourishing as formerly, 50 miles from Brampore.

GODALMING, vulgarly Godlimont, that is, God's Alms, a market-town of Surry, upon the Lodden, abounding with good fish, especially pikes, and several mills upon it. Here are cloth manufactures, particularly mixed kerseys, and blue ones, also stocking-weaving, and whited brown paper. This place has good inns, is famous for liquorice, good carrots, and peat. Here is a market on Wednesday, and fairs Feb. 13, Sept. 28, and Nov. 28. Here is a charity-school, and on the common is an hospital, built and endowed for 10 old men.

GODARD, or GOTHARD, (St.) a mountain in Swisserland, the inhabitants of which are subject to the canton of Ury. It begins about three leagues from Altdorff, and is an important pass into Italy. The road is partly pleasant, and partly rugged and dangerous. In the lower parts are forests, through which you just see the foaming Rufs, and an infinity of other streams. Farther on are frightful rocks, hanging over the road. But the inhabitants keep these passages open summer and winter, at an immense expence and labour, by throwing bridges over steep rocks, supporting the road with walls, buttresses, and stones fastened by iron cramps. About five leagues within this mountain, is a stone bridge of a surprising height, and consisting of one arch, which stands on a rock on each side, and thrown over the Rufs. It is one of the highest parts of Swisserland, from which there is a view of four bishoprics that terminate here; namely, Milan, Navaro, Coire, and Sion, and on it is a convent for monks. Within the circuit of about a league from the top of it there are seven lakes, from which issues the river Tessin that descends into Italy, and also the Rufs, in Latin Urfa, which falls down into Swisserland. About half the way down mount St. Godard, is a bridge of snow and ice, over a hollow, under which runs the Tessin. In these mountains are several mines of iron, crystal and mineral springs, that runs through veins of vitriol and salt-petre. In some of the lakes are taken lampreys, of about eight pounds weight.

GODDARD'S RIVER, named by Carver, after a gentleman in his company, when he descended it. It is small, and runs into the W. bay of lake Superior, North America.

G O

It is Antoninus's Duroliponte, by mistake for Durofiponte; in British, a bridge over the Ouse. It was formerly a considerable place, but now a village of Huntingdonshire, one of the largest in England, and remarkable for its husbandry. The inhabitants met king James I. when he came from Scotland, with 70 new ploughs, drawn by as many teams of horses, in rustic ornaments, for which he made the place a borough. Sometimes they have, it is said, a train of no less than nine score ploughs; for they hold their lands by this tenure. The church here is a vicarage belonging to Westminster-abbey, and Roman coins are frequently dug up in the neighbourhood. An annual fair is kept at Godmanchester, on Easter-Tuesday. Near this town, in the London road, between Huntingdon and Caxton, is a tree well-known to travellers, from which it is proverbially said, when a man is seen to squander away his substance, "that he is in the way to Beggar's Bush." Godmanchester lies about a mile from Huntingdon, and on the opposite side of the river Ouse.

GODMANCHESTER, anciently Gorman-chesster, from Gormon the Dane, who had these parts granted him by the peace with king Alfred.

GODSPEY, or rather Golspey, as it is commonly pronounced; a church village and parish of the shire of Sutherland, in the N. of Scotland, where is kept a considerable fair annually, on St. Andrew's-day, Nov. 30, particularly for cattle to be killed and salted for winter-store. It lies near Dornoch, the shire-town.

GOELLE, or GOVELLE, a small district and subdivision of the Isle of France, the limits of which are not exactly known; the only considerable town in it is Dammartin.

GOER, or GOHRDE, a hunting-seat belonging to the elector of Hanover, king of Great Britain, in the duchy of Brunswick Lunenburg, and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It lies 70 miles N. E. of Hanover.

GOES, a neatly built and walled town on the N. side of the island of S. Beveland, in the province of Zealand. It lies about a mile from the arm of the sea that parts the island from Wolferdyke, communicating with it by a canal, defended by two forts, called the Easter and Wester. It has six gates, three market-places, a grammar-school, and three hospitals. Here is a good harbour, and vessels come up to the town by its canal. To it belongs the lordship of Borselen. It lies 14 miles E. of Middleburg, and 16 W. of Bergen-op-zoom. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 3, 56, E.

GOES, a town of the province of Beira, in Portugal, with between 14 and 1500 inhabitants, 26 miles from the city of Beira.

LI N.

GOGA,

GOGA, a large trading town of Guzuratte, in the East Indies, 10 leagues within the gulph of Cambaya, and on its W. side, almost opposite to Baroche. It has a safe harbour for the largest vessels; which though lying on soft mud, at low-water, float in four or five fathoms perpendicular when the tide rises.

The mogul has an officer here, who commands about 200 that guard the places, and he is subordinate to the governor of Cambaya. Here is the rendezvous of the Portuguese ships in their passage to Goa, and there is a free commerce for strangers at this place, in such merchandise as is proper to be exported from, or imported to Guzuratte.

GOGMAGOG, or HOGMAGOG, so called by the Cambridge students, a chain of hills three miles S. of that university, where are the vestiges of old entrenchments and other works, being an advantageous post, and commanding the whole country hereabouts. On it is a seat belonging to lord Godolphin.

GOIAME, a kingdom of Africa, in Abyssinia, lying at the S. extremity of the lake Dambia. It is almost surrounded on all sides by the Nile, and is become famous since the discovery of the sources of that river.

GOITO, a small town of the duchy of Mantua, and Upper Division of Italy. It lies over the Menzo (Mincius) 14 miles N. W. of Mantua city. It was taken in 1706, by the hereditary prince of Hesse. Lat. 45, 25, N. Long. 11, 15, E.

GOLCONDA, (formerly kingdom of,) but now a province of the Hither India, and Mogul empire, in Asia. It extends itself about 260 miles along the bay of Bengal, being 200 miles where broadest from E. to W. It has Bishnagar on the S. the mountains of Gate on the W. and those of Orixá with Balaguat on the N. as also the river Guenga. The air in general is healthy. Here are only three seasons, namely, an excessively hot summer, an autumn, when they have great rains; and a spring from November to February, when the air is cold. The country abounds with black cattle, sheep, poultry, all sorts of provisions; and has many lakes full of fish. It has plenty of grapes, of which white wine is made, and fruits peculiar to the climate. The country produces indigo, bezoar, two crops of rice, and some other grains. The fields lie generally high, and have reservoirs for water. Here are no mines of gold, silver, or copper, but many of salt, iron, steel, diamonds and other precious stones. These latter induced the great mogul, Aureng-Zebe, to make a conquest of this kingdom; and it is now subject to his successor. In it are no less than 23 mines of diamonds worked; and many more are forbid to be occupied, lest they should become too common. The king of Golconda is said to have had half a million of men in pay in the year 1686, when he was taken prisoner and dethroned. He has vast revenues, what from lands, and the customs on merchandise and provisions, that from salt alone amounting to 1,800,000 crowns, besides the property of all diamonds weighing above five carats. The southern part of the kingdom is the most populous. It furnishes the mogul with a quota of 20,000 horse, and double that number of foot; and its revenue, including that part of Carnate, is 6,250,000l. The English, and other European nations, have settlements on this coast, from which are exported the finest calicoes, chintz, and diamonds.

GOLCONDA, once the capital of the kingdom of its name last mentioned, and the royal residence. It lies in a good air and soil, having fresh water and variety of fruits. It has stone walls and deep ditches; it also had a fortified castle, till Aureng-Zebe took it in 1686, after nine months siege. It formerly suffered much from the inundations of its neighbouring river Guenga, which destroyed two fine stone bridges, the one of 19, and the other of 15 arches, and drowned many thousand people and cattle. Here is a royal chapel, richly adorned. The town lies about 218 miles N. W. of Fort St. George. Lat. 16, 12, N. Long. 78, 2, E.

GOLDBERG, a town of Lignitz, in the duchy of Silesia, 40 miles W. of Breslaw, subject to the king of Prussia. Lat. 51, 42, N. Long. 16, 12, E.

GOLD-MOUNT, a very high pyramidal one, in the island of Sumatra, in the Indian Ocean, in Asia, the rivulets from which afford gold-dust.

GOLD-COAST, a part of Guinea, in Africa, extending along the Atlantic Ocean, where English, Dutch, and other European nations have settlements and forts. Along this coast are reckoned 11 different countries; namely, Axiro, Ante, Adom, Jabi, Commany, Fetu, Saboc, Fantayn, Acron, Agonna, and Aquamboe. In each of these are one, two, or three small towns or villages, lying upon the shore, as well under as betwixt the European forts, their largest and most populous towns being generally more inland.

GOLDEN-ISLAND, in the mouth of the gulph of Darien, belonging to Terra Firma, in S. America, where in the year 1698, a colony of the Scottish nation, attempted to settle; but finding it barren, they quitted it, and possessed themselves of an isthmus on the opposite shore of the continent, namely, Darien, in a fruitful soil, and the the situation naturally so strong, that they could not have been dispossessed by the Spaniards, had not the English ministry at that time abandoned them, and consequently contributed to their subsequent calamities and after destruction. It lies in lat. 9, 14, N. long. 79, 51, E.

GOLD RIVER, lies to the southward of the river Santa Maria, in the Terra Firma, or Isthmus of Darien, affording gold dust in great plenty; whence it has obtained its name.

GOLDINGEN, a town of Courland Proper, in Poland, and formerly one of the Hans towns. It lies on the river Windau, about 30 miles from the Baltic, and about 58 miles from Mittau. Near it is a fine water-fall, and an old castle. It has a large jurisdiction belonging to it. Lat. 57, 38, N. Long. 22, 12, E.

GOLNAU, a town of Pomerania, belonging to Brandenburg, in Germany. It lies on the Ilna, 18 miles N. E. of Stetin, and subject to the king of Prussia. Lat. 53, 55, N. Long. 15, 46, E.

GOMBROON, by the natives called Bander Abassi, a city of Persia, situated in N. lat. 27, 40, E. long. 55, 30. The name of Gombroon, or Comerong, captain Hamilton tells us, it had from the Portuguese, because it was remarkable for the number of prawns and shrimps caught on its coasts, by them called comerong. This city owes its wealth and grandeur to the demolition of Ormus, and the downfall of the Portuguese empire in the East Indies. It is now justly accounted one of the greatest marts in the east, was built by the great shah Abas, and from him, as some think, obtained the name of Bander-Abassi, which signifies the court of Abas. It stands on a bay about nine leagues to the northward of the E. end of the island of Kishmish, and three leagues from the famous Ormus. The English began to settle here about the year 1631, when, in consideration of their services against the Portuguese, shah Abas granted them half the customs of that port. The town is large, but its situation bad, wanting almost every thing that contributes to the happiness, and even support of life. Towards the land it is encompassed by a sort of wall; and towards the sea are several small forts, with a platform, and a citadel, mounted with cannon to secure it and the road from the attempts of an enemy by sea. The houses in most of the streets are so out of repair, some half down, others in a heap of rubbish, that a stranger would imagine the town had been sacked and ravaged by a barbarous people; not a vestige of the wealth really contained in the place appearing in view. The bazars and shops round them are kept, for the most part, by Banians, whose houses are generally in good order. Most of the houses are built with earth and lime, but some of the best with stone. Many of them have a sort of ventilators at top, which contribute greatly to the health of the inhabitants in the hot seasons of the year. The most sickly months here are April, May, September, and October. With fish and mutton the inhabitants are well supplied. Rice is imported from India; and wheat is so plenty, that the poor subsist chiefly on bread and dates. The country hereabouts abounds in the most delicious fruits.

Gombroon is extremely populous, on account of the commerce carried on by the Dutch and English factories, as well as the natives. The English factory is close by the sea, at some distance from the Dutch, which is a commodious fine new building. A great part of the company's profit arises from freights. As the natives have not one good ship of their own, and are extremely ignorant of navigation, they freight their goods for Surat, and other Indian marts, in English and Dutch bottoms, at an exorbitant rate. The commodities of the Gombroon market are, fine wines of different kinds, raisins, almonds, kish-mishes, prunellas, dates, pistachio-nuts, ginger, silks, carpets, leather, tutty, galbanum, ammoniac, asafetida, tragacanth, with other gums, and a variety of shop medicines. These are, in a great measure, the produce of Carmania, which they bring to Gombroon in caravans. The English company had once a small factory in the province of Carmania, chiefly for the sake of a fine wool produced there, and used by the hatters. The English factory here was taken by the French in 1759, and pillaged.

GOMER, or VELEZ DE LA GOMERA, a town and river in the province of Errif, in Africa. It is inhabited by the warlike nation of the same appellation, supposed to be the descendants of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet. It is situated between two hills formed by mount Gomer, and contains about 600 houses, one great square, a weak castle, and small arsenal on the shore, where they build gallies and other small vessels.

GOMERA, one of the Canary Islands, lying between Ferro and Teneriffe. It has one good town of the same name, with an excellent harbour, where the Spanish fleet often take in refreshments. They have corn sufficient to supply the inhabitants, with one sugar work, and great plenty of wines and fruits. It is subject to the Spaniards, who conquered it in 1445. W. long. 17, 10. N. lat. 28, 0.

GOMORA ISLANDS. See JOHANNA.

GOMORRAH, one of the cities of the plain or of the vale of Siddim in Judæa, destroyed, together with Sodom, by fire from heaven, on account of the wickedness of the people. To determine its particular situation at present is impossible.

GONDAR, a town of Africa, in Abyssinia, where the emperor of that country resides. It is about 10 miles in circumference; but the houses consist only of one story, and most of them resemble a funnel with the narrow end upwards. They have no shops, but carry on their trade in a large square, where they expose their merchandise to sale, laid upon mats, and gold and rock-salt are the only money made use of. Each bar of salt is a foot in length, and they break off as much as they agree for in the purchase of small wares. There are about 100 churches, and their patriarch depends on that of Alexandria. The priests have a great power with the people, and sometime abuse it grossly. The Mahometans and the European Christians are held equally in abhorrence, on account of the intrigues carried on by the Jesuits and missionaries a considerable time ago; inasmuch, that all those who now attempt to enter the city are sure of being sacrificed. Some have pretended, that this city is only a camp, in which they were mistaken, for we have our information from an eye-witness. The rainy season in these parts begins in April, and does not cease till the end of September; whence the Nile, and other rivers that have their source in Abyssinia, overflow their banks every year. The inhabitants are tall and comely, and their complexion a dun, or olive colour. The habit of the better sort is made of silks and cottons; but the common people have only drawers. It is 180 miles S. E. of Sennar, and near 1000 S. of Grand Cairo. Long. 38, 25, E. Lat. 13, 10, N.

GONDELINGEN, a town of Bavaria, in Germany. It lies on the N. side of the Danube, a little above Lawingen, and the confluence of the Brentz with that river, 10 miles S. W. of Steinheim.

GONDERCOURT, in Latin Gondalphi Curia, a town of Bar and Lorrain, now subject to France. It lies on the banks of the river Ornain, near the confines of Champagne, and about 18 miles above Bar-le-duc to the S. E.

GONDRECOURT, a town of France, in the duchy of Bar, seated on the river Orney, 20 miles S. of St. Mihiel. Long. 5, 37, E. Lat. 48, 30, N.

GONDREVILLE, a town of Lorrain, seated on the river Moselle. It has a castle, and a magnificent hospital well endowed; its chapel in particular is very fine. It stands very pleasantly on the top of a hill, five miles from Toul, and eight from Nanci. Long. 6, 3, E. Lat. 48, 40, N.

GONESSE, a town of the Isle of France, 10 miles from Paris, remarkable for the goodness of its bread, which is brought twice a week to Paris. Long. 2, 32, E. Lat. 48, 59, N.

GONGA, an ancient town of Turkey, in Europe, and in Romania, seated near the sea of Marmora, 37 miles N. E. of Gallipoli. Long. 37, 31, E. Lat. 40, 53, N.

G O

GONGIOUROU, a village of Guinea, in Negroland, in Africa. It is very considerable, being inhabited by 4 or 5000 negroes, all mirabouts or merchants.

GOODNESSTONE, a village in Kent; with a fair on Sept. 14.

GOOD HOPE, (Cape of,) the most southern promontory of Africa. See HOTTENTOTS.

GOODWIN-SANDS, a large tract of land in Kent, formerly supposed to have been an estate of earl Godwin, but the wall which guarded it from the sea being neglected, it was so overflowed, that it could never after be recovered. These are very dangerous sands for vessels riding in the Downs, which at certain winds that blow hard, are frequently driven upon them. They are about seven miles in length, are divided in two parts by a very narrow channel; they are dry in many places at low water, or long before it. The N. part, which has a triangular form, lies N. and S. towards the sea, extends to the S. W. towards the shore, and runs away to the S. E. to meet the E. side; it is about three miles and a half long, and two and a half broad: the N. end, called North Sand Head, is six miles from the coast: the W. end, which is very dangerous, is called Bunt Head. The largest place which dries in this sand, is known among several seamen by the name of Jamaica Island. The S. part of the Goodwin is three miles and a half in length, and not above a mile in breadth at the N. end, from which it goes away towards the S. W. half W. gradually diminishing till it ends in a narrow point called South Sand Head: this head is only three miles distant from the coast. Storms and strong tides alter these sands more or less every year.

GOR, a mountainous kingdom of Indostan, in the East Indies, in Asia. It is bounded by Turquestan on the N. and E. Kanduana and Pitan on the S. and part of Kakares on the W. though others give it different limits. The country is reckoned 420 miles long, and 165 broad. The rivers Kanda and Perfilis rise here, and fall afterwards into the Ganges. It is subject to the great mogul.

GOR, the capital of the last-mentioned kingdom of its name. It stands at the source of the river Perfilis: but lying far out of the way of trade, we have little farther account of that and other towns in this part of the country, but that it lies 369 miles N. E. of Delly. Lat. 32, 5, N. Long. 85, 10, E.

GORBLES, a village in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, in the W. of Scotland, and under its jurisdiction: on account of which vicinity it is in a thriving thriving condition from the shipping, &c. which come and go continually to and from this part of Scotland.

GORCUM, a neat well-built city of Holland. It is walled, and strongly fortified by art and nature; and, as well as Worcum and Loevenstein, is one of the keys of this country. It stands on the mouth of the little river Ling, which runs through it, and then falls into the Maese. Here is a daily market for corn, butter, cheese, and other provisions conveyed thither by the Ling from the fruitful county of Betau in Guelderland, and afterwards sent by the Maese into the adjacent countries. They have a good church, from the steeple of which may be seen above 20 walled towns, with numberless villages around. An inscription over the water-gate says, "That its citizens are especially remarkable for their loyalty, happy in peace, and unconquered in war." The French could not take it in 1672. It is 26 miles E. of Rotterdam. Lat. 51, 56, N. Long. 4, 54, E.

GORDIUM, a place in Phrygia Major, a province of Asia Minor, formerly the royal seat of Gordius, who became famous for the knot, called the Gordian knot, which he tied in Apollo's temple, promising the monarchy of the world to the person who untied it. Alexander the Great, after several other adventurers, having in vain attempted to loose it, dared at length to cut it with his sword.

GORDON, a large village of Berwickshire, in the S. of Scotland, together with another in the neighbourhood, called West Gordon.

GORDON-CASTLE. See BOG OF GICHT.

GOREE, a small island of Africa, near Cape de Verd, subject to the French. It is barren, but of great importance on account of its good trade. It was taken by the English in May 1759, and given up by the treaty of peace in 1763. During the present war the French have evacuated it, to take possession of Senegal, and the British have become possessors of it for the present. E. long. 12, 15. N. lat. 14, 30.

GOREE, or GOEREE, that is, a good road for ships, the capital of a small island of its name, in Holland. From its harbour it grew very rich; but this being lately choaked up by sand, its trade has declined much. Here is a tower, which is a land-mark for sailors. Goree lies S. of Helvoetsluyes, and 12 miles from the Briell. Lat. 52, 12, N. Long. 3, 54, E.

GORGONA, an island of the Tuscan sea, upon the coast of Florence, and Middle Division, of Italy, where the small fish called sardines or sardels, resembling sprats are taken; and when pickled, are exported, having the denomination of Gor-gona anchovies amongst us, and well-known as a high fish-sauce, &c. It lies 37 miles W. of Leghorn, having Corsica in the same direction, and Pisano on the E. It is 10 miles in circuit, and poorly peopled. On it is only a village, with fishermen's huts, and a castle to defend it from corsairs. Lat. 43, 36, N. Long. 10, 47, E.

GORGONA, a little island in the Pacific ocean, and 20 miles W. of the coast of Peru, in S. America. It is high, and covered with wood; having good water, and an excellent harbour or road on its W. side. Hither buccaneers and several other naval adventurers used to resort, in order to wait for prizes, and take wood and water, the Spaniards having made no settlements here; though sometimes, after the periodical rains, they come to search the rivulets for gold-dust. Here are periwinkles, mussels, and pearl-oysters, in great plenty. Lat. 4, 5, N. Long. 79, 22, W.

GORI, a small town of Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey. This is a small ill-built town, but very well peopled; and most of its inhabitants are merchants. Here is plenty of provisions and cheap. It lies between two mountains on the river Kur, and at the foot of an eminence, on the top of which stands a castle that covers it, the strength of it consisting more in its advantageous situation than its fortifications or the largeness of its garrison, which is only 100 men. Gori is 30 miles W. of Teflis. Lat. 43, 10, N. Long. 46, 30, E.

GORITIA, or GORITZ, a large town of Carniola, in a small county of its name, and circle of Austria, in Germany. It lies on the confines of the Venetian territories, and is tolerably strong. The lower part of it is open; but in the upper part, called the Fortress, is a good garrison. It is 41 miles S. W. of Laubach. Lat. 46, 30, N. Long. 14, 20, E.

GORITIA, (county of,) in which the last-mentioned town of the same name, is the capital, bounded on the N. by Upper Carniola, on the E. by Lower Carniola, and the Alps separate it from Friuli. It is 35 miles in length, and 15 in breadth, and has fine vineyards. Since the extinction of its own counts, it has been subject to the house of Austria.

GORLITZ, one of the principal towns of Upper Lusatia, and one of the largest in the whole marquisate, in Saxony, Germany. In it are several neat churches, and stately stone houses. Their chief trade is in beer, and in dressing and dyeing woollen and linen cloths. It is well-fortified with walls, towers, and ditches; and its approach is difficult, on account of its standing in a morass, on the W. side of the Neiss, which runs through it into the Oder. The great church here has not its equal in Europe, and is particularly noted for its tower and large subterraneous chapel cut out of a rock. Near a small church without the town, is a model of the holy sepulchre of Jerusalem, built a few centuries ago, by the direction of a citizen, who had been several times there. Frequent fires have happened in this town. It lies 20 miles E. of Baudissen, and 48 in the same direction from Dresden. Lat. 51, 28, N. Long. 15, 51, E.

GORTYNA, now a village in the island of Candia, on the coast of Greece and Turkey, in Europe. It was once a famous city, as appears from the noble ruins in marble, jaspe, and granite, very curiously wrought, above six miles distant from mount Ida, at the foot of low hills, and at the entrance into the plain of Messaria, the granary of the island. In the room of those great men who had caused such stately edifices to be erected, you see nothing now but poor simple shepherds. At the farther end of this ruined town, is a brook, doubtless the ancient river Lethe, as Strabo says it ran among the ruins of Gortyna.

GORZE, a town of France, in the territory of Meffin, in Lorraine, seated on a hill, three miles from the river Moselle. It has a very rich abbey, and lies 8 miles S. W. of Metz.

GOSHEN, (land of,) a tract not far from Cairo in Middle Egypt, Africa; where the patriarch Joseph first placed his father and brethren, it being then the most fruitful part in Egypt.

GOSLAR, a sovereign imperial city of Brunswick and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It is a large place, stands on the S. side of the Gose, which rises on the S. E. of Cellerfeldt, and falls into the Ocker, near the confines of Hildesheim. The houses are covered with slate. It lies in a valley surrounded with mountains, in which are considerable mines of iron, lead, and silver. The inhabitants are employed either in digging, cleansing, tempering, and vending the metals and minerals, with the hardware manufactures formed of them. Its protectorship is in the king of Great Britain as elector of Hanover, alternately with the duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttle. The Lutheran is the only religion tolerated in it. Here Bartold Schwartz, the Benedictine monk, is said to have found out the art of making gunpowder. Goslar lies 27 miles S. of Brunswick, and is surrounded by the territories of this duchy. Lat. 52, 12, N. Long. 15, 44, E.

GOSPORT, Hampshire, 79 miles from London, in the parish of Alverstock, has a ferry over the mouth of the harbour to Portsmouth, and is mostly inhabited by the sailors and their wives, and the warrant officers. It is a large town and of great trade, especially in time of war. Travellers choose to lodge here, where every thing is cheaper and more commodious than at Portsmouth. The mouth of the harbour, which is not so broad here as the Thames at Westminster, is secured on this side by four forts, and a platform of above 20 cannon, level with the water. Here is a noble hospital built for the cure of the sick and wounded sailors in the service of the navy, besides a free-school, and the market is on Saturday, and fairs, May 4, and Oct. 10.

GOSTAVIN, or GOSTYN, a small town of the palatinate of Rava, in Great Poland. It is defended by a castle, and lies 38 miles N. of Rava. Lat. 53, 5, N. Long. 20, 10, E.

GOSTEN, a village in the county of Orange, and province of New-York. It is fruitful in cattle, cheese, pasture, and butter. Near it are woods of white cedar, and black walnut-trees.

GOTHA, the capital of Saxe-Gotha, in Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is a large and walled town, with ditches and ramparts, on the Leina, in a fine corn-country, about two days journey S. of Hanover. Its principal trade is in dyers woad, of which they have three crops, the third growing wild. Here is a fortified castle, from which is a vast prospect over a fertile plain. Its sovereign resides here, and keeps an elegant court. In the castle is a collection of valuable curiosities, and a noble library with several manuscripts. In rainy weather the roads here are bad. Four miles off is the pleasure-house of Fredericksward. Gotha lies in lat. 51, 12, N. Long. 10, 41, E.

GOTHARD. See GODDARD.

GOTHLAND, or GOTHIC KINGDOM, in Latin, Gothia, and Gothlandia; a large and fruitful country, and the most southern of all Sweden. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Sweden Proper, being a peninsula, washed on the E. S. and W. sides by the Baltic, the Sund or entrance to it, and part of the German Ocean. Its extent from the confines of Dalecarlia on the N. to the coast of Schonen on the S. is about 330 miles, and from Gottenburg in the W. to Stegeburg in the E. it is about 174. It is divided in general into East, West, and South Gothland. These again are farther subdivided; the first into E. Gothland Proper, Smaland, the Isle of Oeland, and Gothland. The second, into W. Gothland Proper, Warmeland, West-Gothic Thalland or Dalland, and Bahusia-prefecture; the third, into Scania, Halland, and Bleking.

East Gothland Proper, is bounded by Sudermania on the N. the Baltic on the E. Smaland on the S. and the Wetter-lake on the W. This level country producing plenty of corn and cattle, with fish, fowl, and venison.

West Gothland Proper, is a large province, confining on Smaland on the S. E. Halland on the S. W. and and has the river Gothelba, on the N. W. by which it is parted from the government of Bahus and the province of Dalia, on the N. the Wener-lake and part of Warmeland, and on the E. part of Nericia and the Wetter-lake, which divides it from East Gothland Proper. It is watered by a great number of lakes and rivers; abounds with excellent pastures, on which vast quantities of cattle are bred, and the country enriched by the sale of them. Its principal town is Gottenburg.

South Gothland is bounded on the N. by East and West Gothland, and is surrounded every way else by the sea. See the other subdivisions under their respective words.

GOTHLAND, (island of,) belonging to Sweden. It lies in the Baltic, opposite to the coast of East Gothland, in Sweden, from which it is about 52 miles distant, to the E. between lat. 57, 58, N. and between long. 18, 20, and 30, O. E.

Its greatest length, from S. W. to N. E. is about 108 miles; but its breadth is not above 36 from E. to W. and is very justly called the eye of the Baltic, from its commodious situation, lying between the province of Gothland and Livonia. It has often changed its masters. The Danes took it from the Swedes in 1677, but afterwards restored it by the treaty of Fontainebleau, in 1679. Here is but one considerable town, namely, Wisby.

GOTHS, a warlike nation, and above all others famous in the Roman history, came originally out of Scandinavia, (the name by which the ancients distinguished the present countries of Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and Finmark.) According to the most probable accounts, they were the first inhabitants of those countries; and from thence sent colonies into the islands of the Baltic, the Cimbric Chersonesus, and the adjacent places yet destitute of inhabitants. The time of their first settling in Scandinavia, and the time when they first peopled with their colonies the abovementioned islands and Chersonesus, are equally uncertain; though the Gothic annals suppose the latter to have happened in the time of Serug, the great-grandfather of Abraham.

GOTLIEBEN, a town of the Thourgaw, a territory belonging to the Swiss cantons. It lies on the side of the lake of Constance; about a league from the city of this name, and in the road to Stein. It has a strong castle.

GOTTENBURG, a town of West Gothland Proper, in Sweden, on the Skagarac or Cattegat, on the southern branch of the river Gothelba, near the Moludal, which there falls into the sea, and forms a most excellent harbour. It was first built in 1607, by Charles IX. on the island of Hisingen; but being destroyed by the Danes in 1611, the inhabitants about seven years after, removed to the place where the town now stands, and were favoured with several considerable privileges. Gottenburg carries on the greatest trade of any city in Sweden, except Stockholm. It is situated on the borders of West Gothland, at the mouth of the river Moludal, which runs close by the N. side of the city, and is conveyed through it by several canals. The streets are broad and kept very clean, and since the year 1746, the greater part of the houses have been rebuilt with stone. It is regularly fortified, and on the land-side is defended by two citadels, called the Lion and the Crown; and towards the sea by the citadel of New Elfsburg. The governor of the prefectures of Gottenburg and Bohus, who is also commandant of the forts and fortifications, resides in this city. Gottenburg is a bishop's see, and has two printing-houses, a city church, a seminary, an orphan-house, and edifice called the crown-house, where the garison attend divine service, a German church, and several quays and docks. The number of inhabitants is said to amount to 13,000. In 1731, an East-India company was established in this city, for the harbour is a very fine one, and is resorted to by a great number of ships; there is here also a college of admiralty and a court of appeals. Lat. 58, 29, N. Long. 11, 36, E.

GOTTINGEN, a town of Grubenhagen, a principality belonging to Hanover, in the duchy of Brunswick and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It is supposed to be the Munitium of the ancients, and stands on the river Leyne. It is a strong town, and was in vain besieged by the Imperialists in 1641. It is of most note for an university or academy founded here in 1734, by the elector of Hanover, George II. king of Great Britain. It lies 38 miles S. of Hildesheim, 24 N. E. of Capel, and 50 from Hanover. Lat. 51, 46, N. Long. 9, 56, E.

GOTTORP, or GOTTORFF, a town of Sleswick or South Jutland, in Denmark. It is the ancient seat and patrimony of the dukes of Holstein, is about six miles distant from Sleswick to the S. W. and stands on the Sley, which almost surrounds it, and by which vessels of small burthen go to and from the Baltic. This is both a fortress and a palace, and justly reckoned one of the finest seats in these northern parts. The castle stands to the W. of the Sley, in the middle of a little lake, and is approached by a bridge, which joins it to the S. shore. A rampart encompasses the first court, and the inner gate is of a fine blue stone, as hard and beautiful as marble, with a lanthorn over it, containing 27 lights. On the N. side is a bridge, which terminates in a walk between rows of trees which lead to the garden, in which which are a great many water-works and cascades. On the left is a basin 200 feet square, and rows of stately trees on all sides, which, however, lie open to the N. On the sides of the lake are also many fine arbours, and an Hercules of a monstrous size, in the middle, represented with his club in the act of killing the Lernaean hydra, out of every part of which water plays. In every corner are statues which form cascades. On the N. is a parterre, in the form of a crescent, divided into several compartments, with niches round, containing the busts of many kings, both ancient and modern. Here also several fabulous animals are represented, all of which throw up water. At the end of the walk is to be seen in a small room a globe made by the great Tycho Brahe, so contrived, that by mechanism it exhibits his system of the world. The park is a very noble one, being at least four English miles in circumference, and full of fallow-deer and stags. Here is a custom-house, where toll is paid for large droves of black cattle, that pass this way from the country into Germany, which produces a considerable sum to the royal treasury, 50,000 of those animals being thus disposed of, on an average annully. Lat. 54, 56, N. Long. 10, 12, E.

GOUDA, GOUDET, or FERGOW, a city of Holland, upon the little river Gow and Yessel, which a few miles lower fall into the Maese. It is a neat place, and is pretty healthy, though standing in a marsh. By sluices the adjacent country may be laid under water, and by this means inaccessible, but by two banks on this side the Yssel, which are strongly fortified, besides the town has a good wall and ditches. Here is the largest market-place in Holland, in the middle of which stands the town-house, and near it the great church with a stately tower; the paintings on the windows are extremely fine, the work of two brothers, natives of Gouda, of the name of Crabeth, the most eminent painters on glass that ever were, whose art is said to have died with them. In the town is a multitude of canals and small currents, which are cleansed by the tide. Here were formerly 350 brewhouses; but that branch of trade has dwindled almost to nothing. Their principal manufactures now are cordage, and particularly very neat pipes, for which they have a very extensive trade. In the neighbourhood are made a vast quantity of bricks and tiles. Goudesluys lies near the old channel of the Rhine, between Bodegrave and Leyden. It was fortified to stop the incursions of the French in 1672 and 1673. Gouda lies 12 miles N. E. of Rotterdam, and 14 S. E. of Leyden. Lat. 52, 51, N. Long. 4, 46, E.

GOUDESLUYS. See GOUDA.

GOUDHURST, a market-town of Kent. It lies nine miles from Maidstone, and 6 from London. An annual fair is holden here on the 26th of August.

GOVENS-HEAD, or POINT, (St.) a promontory of Pembrokeeshire, in South Wales.

GOVERNOLO, a small town of the duchy of Mantua, in the Upper Division of Italy, on the Minchio, at the confluence of that river with the Po. It is supposed to be the Ager Ambuleius of the ancients, and by them placed in the territory of the Veneti. The Imperialists took it in 1702, and the French re-took it the following year, but it is now subject to the house of Austria. It lies 14 miles S. E. of the city of Mantua. Lat. 25, 18, N. Long. 11, 31, E.

GOUGANE-BARRA, a lake consisting of about 200 acres, in the county of Cork, in Ireland, nearly circular, in which is a small island called St. Finbar's Hermitage. This lake produces good trout, broader and flatter than trouts in general are.

GOULBUGSHAW, as the Turks call it, the largest of the inland lakes of Asia Minor or Anatolia, in Asiatic Turkey. Its extent is from long. 32 to 33, 20, E. and from lat. 37, 40, to 38, 10, N. being upwards of 50 miles long and 22 broad.

GOURA, a town of Bengal and Mogul empire in the East Indies, in Asia. It stands on the Ganges. It was once a considerable city, nine miles in compass according to some, though others say many more, as having been the seat of several kings of Bengal, each of whom built his own sumptuous large palace: many ruins of these are still to be seen, and at present the town is almost depopulated.

GOURIA, or GOURIEL, once a province of Mingrelia, in Asia, and subject to the king of Imeritia, whose yoke, in imitation of the Mingrelians, they shook off, and chose a chief from among themselves, who maintains himself in his independency by means of the Porte, to which he pays an annual tribute of 46 boys and girls, that are to be sent to the basha of Akalzike.

GOURNAY, a town of Bray, in Normandy, in France, on the river Epte. It lies in a good plain, partly pasture and partly arable land, has a collegiate and parochial church, with a castle, several monasteries, &c. five leagues above Gisors to the N. and 10 from Rouen.

GOWER, (St.) or St. GOAR, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and in the territories of the house of Hesse-Rhienfels. By the treaty of Utrecht the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel was put in possession of this town and castle. It is seated on the river Rhine, 15 miles S. E. of Coblenz, and 47 N. E. of Treves. Long. 8, 4, E. Lat. 50, 2, N.

GOWER-

GOWERLAND, the western limits of Glamorganshire, in South Wales, from the Neath to the Loughor, is called by us Gower, and by the Britons Gwyr, being divided into E. and W. Gowerland, in the eastern division of which is Swansea.

GOWRAN, a town in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland. It is a populous place, and has a strong castle, which Cromwell took in 1649. It lies five miles from Kilkenny.

GOWROCK, a small town and castle in the shire of Renfrew, and W. of Scotland. It lies at the western extremity of a bay on the frith of Clyde. Here is a noted road and harbour lately fitted up.

GOWRY, a territory of Perthshire in the N. of Scotland, commonly called the Carse of Gowry. In it are noble fields of corn, and it is reckoned the most beautiful spot in all Scotland, extending 14 miles in length, and between two and four in breadth, on the N. side of the Tay, from Dundee to Perth, and all a perfect garden.

GOYAM, or GOJAMA, a pretty large kingdom of Africa. It is so surrounded with the Nile, that it looks like a peninsula. It is divided to the E. from the kingdoms of Bagemder, Anshara, Oleca, and Upper Choa; to the S. from those of Catates, and Bizamo; to the W. from the kingdoms of Garche, Goaga, and Agans, and to N. from that of Dambea. It is much higher and more mountainous in the middle than in its extreme parts; and those heights are partly inhabited, especially towards the springs of the Nile, which lie on the western part of this kingdom; about the isthmus made by the river is a very steep and almost inaccessible mountain, on the top of which is an oval plain, 250 fathoms long, and 130 broad; and to it are two paths across the rocks, with an excellent spring on one side. More towards the Nile is a plain separated from this mountain by a natural trench, where the viceroy resides in a camp; the northern parts are altogether mountainous and rocky.

GOYOGOUIN, the third canton of Nova Scotia, bordering on New York to the westward; and hence, with those of Onneyouth, Onantagne, and Tsonnouthonan, following each other in order, are called the Upper Cantons, unless they have been so denominated from meeting with them in the arrangement as one goes up the river St. Lawrence, and the lake Ontario, through which that river runs. The canton of Goyogouin surpasses all the others in the goodness of the soil, and mildness of the climate; and the inhabitants appear the most tractable amongst all the Iroquois.

VOL. I.—No. 49.

Over the whole extent of these five cantons our European fruit-trees may be cultivated with success; several grow of themselves there without culture; and others are to be found there which are unknown to us.

GOYOGOUINS, (bay of,) in Nova Scotia, lies 10 leagues from the river of Onnontagne. All the coast in this space is intermixed with marshes and high grounds a little sandy, covered with very fine trees, especially oak. A peninsula, well wooded, stretches out to the middle of a bay, and forms a kind of theatre. On the left hand, at entering it, one perceives in a corner a little island, which hides the mouth of a river, by which the Goyogouins go down into the lake.

GOZO, or GOZZI, the larger of two islands, the other called Antigozi, lying opposite to cape Crio in Candia, and European Turkey, but a little to the S. W. Pliny calls it Gaudos, and Ptolemy Claudos.

GOYTE, a river in Derbyshire and Lancashire, which runs into the Mersey opposite Goyt.

GOZO, or more properly IL GOZZO, anciently Gaulos, an island granted by the emperor Charles V. to the Knights of Malta, from which it is divided by the channel of Friol, between two and three miles broad. It is about 24 miles in circuit, and surrounded with high and craggy rocks, and dangerous shelves, which render the access to it very difficult; but in the midland it is very fertile, and well cultivated. When the Turks seized on it in 1551, about 6000 of the inhabitants of both sexes were made slaves; it had then only a castle built on a hill, of little or no strength. But upon the retaking of it in 1599 by the grand master, Martin Garzes, such works have been added, as render it impregnable: so that the Turkish and other corsairs have in vain attempted to surprise it, especially in 1613 and 1709, they found it so well guarded and fortified, that they did not venture to set foot upon it.

GRABOW, or GRUBOW, a town in the duchy of Mecklenburg, and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It lies 19 miles S. of Schwerin. Lat. 53, 46, N. Long. 11, 48, E.

GRACE, or GRASSE, in Latin Grinnicum, a populous and rich city, and one of the most considerable in Provence in France. It stands upon a hill, in a very fruitful soil. It is the see of a bishop, removed hither from Antibes, from which it lies three leagues to the S. E. on account of the insalubrity of the air, and depredation of pirates. Besides its cathedral, here are several other churches, and a great number of monasteries; 20 miles S. W. of Nice, and 60 N. E. of Toulon. Lat. 43, 51, N. Long. 6, 56, E.

GRACEY,

GRACEY, a town of Lower Berry, in France. It lies on the rivulet Pafon, and is surrounded with walls flanked with towers, the largest of which is an octagon upon a rising ground, and supported by four thick walls, in the form of arches. It belongs to the holy chapel of Bourges, from which city it lies nine leagues to the W.

GRACIAS A DIOS, a name by way of thanksgiving to the Almighty, which Columbus in his voyage gave upon a favourable wind springing up, to a cape of Honduras in Mexico, South America. It lies in lat. 14, 36, N. long. 84, 12, W. Of the same name is a town at the mouth of a river, not far from the cape, and upon a rocky mountain, which has some gold-mines in its neighbourhood; and built about the same year as Valladolid, from which it lies about 27 leagues to the W. in order to secure the miners. The adjacent valley abounds with wheat, which is mostly exported to Guatimala; and it breeds very good mules and horses.

GRACIOSA, one of the Azores or Western Islands. Its inhabitants are about 3000, and its produce wheat, wine, butter, and cheese.

GRADACIO, (Monte,) a very remarkable mountain about the middle of the island of Corsica.

GRADISCA, formerly a part of the little county of Goritz, the latter being a subdivision of Carniola, in the circle of Austria, Germany.

GRADISKA, or GRADISK, a strong and well-built frontier town in the generalate of Sclavonia, in Hungarian Illyrium. It is the Servitium of the ancients. It stands on the river Sava. In 1691 the Imperialists took it from the Turks, and it now subject to the house of Austria. It lies 30 miles W. of Jofega. Lat. 45, 36, N. Long. 18, 12 E.

GRADO, an island at the bottom of the Adriatic sea, in the duchy of Venice, in Upper Italy. It lies 40 miles N. E. of Venice. Lat. 46, 29, N. Long. 13, 56, E. Of the same name is a town, and also called Aquileia Nova, situated near the continent, and on the confines of Friuli. In 1734 this city was reduced to ashes, since which time it has never been able to recover itself. The rest of the island, and most of the town, is filled with gardens, and the whole surrounded with a great number of smaller islands. Both the island and the city are by the natives called Grado.

GRAHAM'S DYKE, as it is called in the Scottish histories, the famous Roman wall, which went by the name of Severus' or Adrian's wall. It lies in West Lothian, and S. of Scotland, having been built by several persons at different times, for repelling the Picts, Irish, and other nations in the Highlands, and for covering the provincial Britons against their incursions. It was begun in the time of Julius Agricola, where the river Forth was narrow, and so was carried along the neck of land betwixt that and the Frith of Clyde, which was not above 16 miles over; but afterwards farther E. and was several times repaired, till the destruction of the Roman empire in Britain put an end to it. This wall had a ditch 22 feet wide on the N. side, and towards the enemy's country the rampart itself was 10 feet thick, besides a wall of squared and cut stone, two feet broad, to keep the earth from falling into the ditch, and to cover the defendants. Here were watch-towers within call of one another. Besides these, there were along the wall, and on its inside, large forts strongly intrenched, as may be seen in Camden's Britannia, from Mr. Pont's accounts, who traced them. The length of this chain was 36 Scottish miles; for beginning between Queensferry and Abercorn, it raised along W. by the Grange and Kineil, to Innercervy, so on to Falkirk; thence it proceeded directly to the forest of Camernald, and then ran to the great fort, which was on the top of the Baulhill, where several stones have been found, some with figures engraved on them, and some with inscriptions; from this it went to the pool of Kirkintilloch or Kaerpentalloch, the largest fort of all, and so W. to Kilpatrick near Dunbarton. In the ruins of the fort at Bankyrie was found a very large iron shovel; and several sepulchres covered with large rough stones; and at Dunchroo-chyrr, near Monyabroch, were formerly large buildings. It had also several square fortifications, in the form of Roman camps.

GRAIN-COAST, under which name Malaguetta, a country of Africa, in Spanish signifying Paradise grain, or Guinea-pepper, is generally known, that growing here very plentifully. See MALAGUETA.

GRAMPIAN, or GRANTZBANE HILLS, in Latin Mons Grampius, very high mountains, beginning near Lochlommond, a lake of Strathern, in Perthshire, and N. of Scotland; and at the foot of which lies the town of Dunkeld, near the Tay. They ran in a long chain north-easterly, as far as Aberdeen and the German ocean.

GRANDMONT, or GRAMMONT, a small town of La Marche, in France. It has a famous abbey, the principal of its order, lying in bleak and barren mountains, at the foot of which however are some cultivated places. The church of this abbey was built at the expence of Henry I. and II. kings of England. The son of the latter, namely, Richard, surnamed Cœur-de-Lion, or Lion-heart, spared nothing to beautify the church of our Lady, granting it several privileges. King Henry

Henry III. was also very liberal in behalf of this abbey, the cloister and other buildings having been magnificently adorned by him as they are at present. Grandmont lies six leagues from Limoges to the N. E.

GRANDMONT, commonly GRAMMONT, in Flemish Geertsbergen, i. e. Gerard's Mount, and in Latin Gerardi Mons, a town of Flanders, in the Austrian Netherlands. It stands on the river Dende, with one parochial church, dedicated to St. Bartholomew, an abbey and nunnery, both of Benedictines, and some other religious foundations. In its territory are 45 villages, which, with the town, belong to the country of Alost. In the neighbourhood of this city are several forests with convents in them; one of which, a Carthusian monastery, namely, that of St. Martin, was founded in 1328 by John Seylincks, who, from a low extraction, became first counsellor to Lewis of Nevers, earl of Flanders, and so much in favour, that his master gave him his daughter in marriage: but the lady shewing great discontent at this unequal match, her husband left her on the wedding-day, and could never be persuaded to a consummation. Grandmont lies 18 miles S. E. of Ghent. Lat. 50, 46, N. Long. 4, 5, E.

GRAMPOUND, a borough of Cornwall, governed by a mayor, who returns two members to parliament. It lies nearly in the middle of the county, with a bridge over the river Falle. Although it consists but of one street, and has only a chapel of ease to the parish of St. Creed, king Edward III. granted it considerable privileges; among which is the remains of a Coedfala, i. e. in British, Felon-wood, and all the lands in it, to the town, an exemption from toll throughout Cornwall, &c. Its weekly market is on Tuesday, and annual fairs on January 18, March 25, and June 11. It lies 38 miles from Launceston, and 243 from London.

GRAN, (county of,) in Lower Hungary; its Latin name is Strigonium. It lies S. E. of that of Raab, being 37 miles long and 22 broad.

GRAN, a royal-free town of the county last mentioned of the same name. It lies on the S. side of the Danube, opposite to Barcan, where that river receives the Gran, which latter issues from the Carpathian mountains. It stands in a very fruitful country, producing great quantities of wine, and was once the metropolis of Hungary. It is well fortified, and divided into Upper and Lower towns, the latter of which commands the Danube. Here is the see of an archbishop, valued before the loss of Newhanfel at 340,000 florins, but now not worth 100,000. The castle, archbishop's palace, and St. Stephen's cathedral, are the principal among its many noble structures.

Here are two large towers, one towards Thoneburg, and the other facing the river, which are joined by a wall fortified with divers redoubts, and a ditch flanked with hewn stone, besides a pallisadoed terrace, and four great points like ravelines: and there is also a strong fort built on St. Thomas's hill. It has often changed its masters. In the year 1596 the Imperialists took this place from the Turks. In the siege of it at that time, Sir Thomas Arundel of Wardour castle, for his signal valour in storming the water-tower, and pulling down the Turkish banner, &c. was created a count of the empire by the emperor Rudolph, and afterwards king James I. made him a baron of England; which honours are still enjoyed by his posterity. The Turks retook Gran, and kept it till 1683, when, after the defeat of their army before Venice by John Sobieski, the Imperialists recovered and defended it against the Turks, who again attacked it in 1685, but were entirely defeated by the dukes of Lorraine and Bavaria. It is still subject to the house of Austria, and lies 41 miles N. W. of Buda. Lat. 48, 21, N. Long. 18, 46, E.

GRANADA, formerly a kingdom, now a province of Spain. It is one of those four that composed the province of Andalusia, taken in its largest extent; as including not only the greatest part of the Roman province of Bætica, but likewise the latter Vandalicia, or county of the Vandals, corruptedly called Andalusia, which was the last of the Moors, and held out longest against the Christian Princes, who had stripped them of all Spain besides, being enabled by the great supplies constantly brought them from Africa to hold out many years; and were not totally dispossessed till the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella.

This kingdom is divided on the N. from the province of Andalusia by the mountains of Cazorla, Sierra, Morena, Segura, and some others; on the E. another chain parts it from Murcia; on the S. it is contiguous again to Andalusia, without any marked boundary; and on the W. the Mediterranean washes it. Its whole length from E. to W. is about 210 miles, and its greatest breadth does not exceed 72. Its soil is very rich and fruitful; for, besides those immense quantities of corn, wine, oil, fruit, cattle, game, fish, &c. which it has in common with the finest provinces of Spain, the most craggy mountains are every where covered with vines, fruit-trees, and grapes, some of the bunches of which, it is said, weighed forty pounds. Sugar is also cultivated here in abundance, and exceeds any in Spain for fineness. They manufacture silk in such quantities, as to serve the whole kingdom, besides what is exported. Those parts which are reckoned the most barren, are covered with aromatic herbs and odoriferous shrubs. Its maritime situation is excellent, having a great number of commodious ports and harbours, with considerable exports and imports. To say nothing of its ancient stately structures, which though mostly fallen into decay, since the expulsion of the Moors, retain so much of their pristine magnificence, as to give an idea of the rest; the mines here of gold and silver, besides other metals, were so rich, that the revenue of the Moorish kings were found, at its recovery by king Ferdinand, to have amounted to 1,000,000 ducats annually. This little kingdom has indeed dwindled since, with regard to the number of its cities and inhabitants; for of no less than 33 cities in the time of the Moors, all rich and populous, there are not now above 16 that retain this title, and those not quite so full of inhabitants.

GRANADA, the capital of the last mentioned province. It stands at the foot of a very high mountain, called Sierra Nevada towards the S. and on the E. side is mount Elvira, being between two pleasant vallies, intersected by the river Darro; whilst the W. side opens into a spacious plain; the latter river having run through the city, discharges itself into the Xenil, which waters the rest of that plain. This city is one of the largest and most magnificent in Spain, being nearly 12,000 paces in circuit, and surrounded with a wall and towers, having 20 gates. At the two opposite ends or eminences, stand two noble ancient castles, besides others less considerable. The city is well supplied with water, and has now five spacious squares, besides that called Bivarambla, near the great church, with a curious fountain in the middle. The buildings in all the squares are handsome and regular; and the streets leading to them are straight and wide. Other structures of note are without the city, as the royal hospital, the monastery of St. Jerome, both of them magnificent. The arsenal is a noble edifice and well furnished with arms.

It is the see of an archbishop, whose annual revenue amounts to 40,000 ducats. The cathedral is a very beautiful structure; the Moorish mosque in its neighbourhood is a large and clumsy piece of Gothic architecture. It has an university, consisting of five colleges. The number of inhabitants is said to be 50,000 families in 24 parishes, has 22 monasteries, 18 nunneries, and 13 hospitals, besides chapels and other religious and charitable foundations. Its silk manufactures are excellent. It lies 67 miles N. E. of Malaga, and 200 S. of Madrid. Lat. 37, 28; N Long. 3, 51, E. This city, the metropolis and last refuge of the Moorish prince, Arenalmer, who made so stout a resistance against the Christians, being taken, and he himself cut off by Ferdinand, the domination of the infidels in Spain determined, which lasted 780 years in all.

GRANADA, a city in the province of Nicaragua, and audience of Guatemala, in Old Mexico, or New Spain. It is situated on the S. side of the lake of Nicaragua, 63 miles S. E. of Leon; where the Spaniards have mills for the making of sugar, canes abounding in that neighbourhood. It is defended by a castle, is more populous and better built than Leon, and the inhabitants carry on a trade both to the North and South Seas. It is the most frequented of any town in all Guatemala, as the merchants of Guatemala dispatch their goods from hence by the way of Carthagena. This town was taken in 1680, by some French and English freebooters, who set fire to it. The intermediate country lying between this city and Leon, is very fruitful and pleasant. Near Granada, on the side of Nicaragua lake, is a volcano, which may be seen from the North Sea, or at least a great way in the lake towards that sea. It is a frightful hill, being cleft down almost from the top to the bottom, like a broken saw, and our sailors call it the Devil's Mouth. Granada lies 51 miles W. from the city of Mexico. Lat. 11, 26. Long. 89, 12.

GRANADA, (island of,) or GRENADA, one of the Caribbee islands. It is situated in lat. 12, 10, and long. 43, 40, about 20 leagues N. W. of Tobago, and 20 N. of New Andalusia, on the continent of America; to which this is the nearest of all the French islands in the Antilles, 30 leagues S. W. of Barbadoes, and 70 from Martinico. Its extent from N. to S. being nine leagues in length, and five where broadest; it is twice as large as St. Christopher's, and 24 leagues in compass.

This island, has a chain of mountains, some of which are very high, crosses it from N. to S. It enjoys a good air, and has a soil so fruitful, that all the trees upon it, both for fruit and timber, are better, straighter, taller, and larger, than those in the neighbouring islands, the cocoa-tree excepted, which does not grow so high here as in the other neighbouring islands. The most remarkable tree in this island is the Latin-tree, which has a tall trunk, and instead of boughs, bears leaves, like fans, in long stalks, which growing together in bundles, serve for the roofs of houses. Here are salt-pits, and armadillos, whose flesh is as good as mutton, and is the principal food of the inhabitants, besides tortoises and lamantins. The coast has abundance of fine vallies, watered with good rivers, which issue from a lake at the top of high mountains in the middle of the island; and one of them runs into the sea on the S. W. where the shore is low, with good anchorage at the distance of 12 leagues; but an exceeding strong current, which which both ebbs and flows in a few hours. In short the soil is capable of producing all the commodities of the climate. Its particular articles, besides cattle, wild fowl, and turtle; are ginger, indigo, and tobacco, with millet and pease. Along the shore run mountains, and also about the harbour, where the habitations are, but they are few in number; but all the rest of the country is divided into gentle eminences and plains, which every where are capable of cultivation; and here is good travelling either for horses or carriages.

There is good anchoring ground all along the coast, and on the E. and W. sides of the island are several small bays and creeks, commodious for vessels, and for landing and shipping goods; and there are two of the finest harbours in the world in Granada.

Its principal port, called Fort Royal, stands in the middle of a large bay on the S. W. side of the island, having a sandy bottom, where 25 ships of the line may ride secure from storms; and the harbour will contain 100 ships of 1000 tons, moored. Near the harbour is a large round basin, parted from it by a sand-bank, which if cut, would hold a vast number of vessels, by reason of this bank large ships are obliged to pass within 80 paces of one of the two little mountains at the mouth of the harbour, and about half a mile asunder. Upon one of these a French engineer erected a fort, with a half-moon in front, and other regular works, all of good stone.

The Dominicans have a settlement four leagues N. of the fort, which is upwards of a mile in breadth; through the middle of it runs a large river, abounding with eels, mullets and cray-fish; as the adjacent countries do with partridges, wood-pigeons, ortolans, thrushes, parrots, &c. The people here are subject to obstinate fevers, which turn sometimes to a dropsy. One third of the island is not cultivated; and though a great part of this space is taken up by mountains incapable of being ploughed, yet many places remain to be cultivated by industry; however the whole exports of Granada in 1770, were more than 506,000*l.* sterling. Before the year 1763, this was a neutral island, when the English became possessed of it by the peace, but it was taken by the French July 2, 1779. In 1771, this island received a very considerable loss by a fire at St. George's town, the capital of the island, which it had scarcely recovered before another happened, Nov. 1, 1775, which burnt down the whole town, and the loss was estimated at above 500,000*l.* Lat. 11, 13. Long. 61, 36.

GRANADA, (New,) a province of Terra Firma. It borders on Carthage and St. Martha's on the N. Venezuela on the E. Papayan on the S. and Darien on the W. Its length is reckoned to be 130 leagues, or 390 miles, and its breadth, about 30 leagues or 90 miles. It is surrounded with savage nations, who inhabit a very hot country; though New Granada, generally speaking, is cold, or at least temperate.

The natives use maize, or the cassava root, instead of bread. They have plenty of salt, which they sell to great profit in the neighbouring countries, particularly those situated in the mountains, and along the river Magdalena. They have store of game; the lakes and rivers abound with fish. The natives are tall, and wear black, white, or variegated cloaks, which they tie round the waist with a sash. They adorn their heads with strings of painted flowers, very ingeniously made of cotton. The country abounds with gold and silver mines; and as they have store of horses and mules, they send a great many of them into Peru. The country abounds with pasture, wheat and other grain, and likewise with fruit.

GRANADILLAS, or GRENADILLAS, a knot of dangerous islands and rocks, near the Leeward islands, where the greatest channel is but three or four leagues broad. They lie about the 18th degree of lat. and are a range of small islands and rocks dependent on Granada. This Archipelago, whose length is about 14 leagues, contains 23 islands fit to produce cotton, coffee, indigo, and even sugar. The air is healthy, but there are no running springs of fresh water. The most considerable at the N. end of the chain is not above two leagues from St. Vincent, and is called Becouya, or Bequia, but the French called it Little Martinico. Besides this, there are the islands of Moskito and Canaouan; Frigate island, and Union island, are between Becouya and Cariaucou. The Grison, and the Round island, are the two principal ones among those which fill up the interval, between Cariaucou and Granada.

GRANDBY, a village in Nottinghamshire, near Bingham, with a fair Nov. 1.

GRANDE, a river in S. America, which empties itself into the Atlantic.

GRANDE, the southern branch of the Niger, in Africa, which empties itself into the Atlantic.

GRAND-PRE, a small town of Champagne in France; so called from the large meadows, in the middle of which it stands, 36 miles E. of Rheims. Lat. 49, 21, N. Long. 4, 56, E.

GRAND-RIVER. See RIO-GRANDE.

GRANDENTZ, or GRAUDENTZ, a city of Royal Prussia, in Poland, upon the Vistula. It lies 50 miles S. of Dantzick. Lat. 53, 55, N. Long. 19, 12, E.

GRANICUS, a small river of Asia Minor, near near the Hellespont. It is famous, as near its banks the first battle was fought between Alexander the Great, with the forces of Darius, king of Persia.

GRANSON, a bailiwick of Berne in Switzerland, altogether Protestant. It has Mount Jura to the W. the county of Neuchâtel to the N. the bailiwicks of Orbe and Yverdon to the S. and the lake of Geneva E. It is a fruitful tract, interspersed with fields, vines, and meadows. The cantons of Berne and Friburg send bailiffs hither alternately every five years. The town of the same name, which has a castle by the side of Neuchâtel lake, is noted for the siege which it sustained against the duke of Burgundy, and for the victory which the Swiss gained over him there, in March 1476, when he was obliged to leave all his treasure and rich baggage behind him in the field.

GRANTA, the ancient name of the river Cam, which washes the university of Cambridge. Grantchester was an old castle upon the same river, and was probably on the site of the present village of Grantchester.

GRANTHAM, a populous borough of Lincolnshire. It is a town of great resort, and has abundance of good inns, lying on the N. road. It is governed by an alderman, who returns two members to the British parliament. Here is a fine large church, with a lofty spire of stone, 280 feet high, which by a mere deception of sight, seems to stand awry; also a good free-school, built and endowed by Dr. Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester, who was a native of this town; and here the celebrated Sir Isaac Newton received his first education; besides here are two charity-schools. Between it and the village of Ancaster are several remains of antiquities, and also a Roman castle in Grantham itself. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fairs are kept here the 5th Monday in Lent, Holy Thursday, July 10, and Oct. 26. It lies 24 miles from Lincoln, and 110 from London.

GRANVILLE, a town of Coutances and Normandy, in France, with a small harbour upon the English channel. The principal trade of the inhabitants consists in fresh and salt cod, also oysters and other fish. Here is but one gate, defended by some fortifications; but in time of war a garrison is kept in the place.

This town is 12 leagues S. S. E. from cape Carteret, stands upon the top of a steep and rugged rock almost surrounded by the sea. The harbour lies E. N. E. and W. S. W. at the foot of the rock, on the S. side; it is formed by a jetty built of loose stones, near 180 yards in length. There is no road at Granville; but ships generally anchor at cape Lihou, on the W. end of the rock, where the ground is good; and about three leagues to the S. W. of Granville, lies the road of Cancalle, which is a very good one; as also that of Chaufey, (little rocky islands, three leagues W. N. W. of Granville,) which though not so convenient, affords shelter to ships in bad weather.

Between Granville and the Road of Cancalle, lies the deep bight, called Mount St. Michael's bay. Lat. 48, 58, N. Long. 1, 32, W.

GRANVILLE COUNTY, the most southern subdivision of South Carolina, of which the other three are Colleton, Berkeley, and Craven. It is situated along the river Savannah, and reckoned the most convenient and fruitful part of all Carolina. Here a colony of Scots settled under lord Cardross, but were obliged to quit it for fear of the Spaniards; so that the country continued uninhabited by any Europeans till the year 1732, when one Monsieur Purry, a gentleman of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland, being encouraged by the government both in England and Carolina, undertook to settle a company of Swiss there; and accordingly 172 persons were transported thither the aforesaid year, who were soon followed by a great many more; so that in a very little time the colony consisted of above 300 persons. They settled on the northern bank of the river Savannah, where they built a town, which they called Purryburgh, about 36 miles above the mouth of the river. The side which M. Purry pitched on is in lat. 32, 20, on a spot of ground formerly called the great Yamasee-Bluff.

In the county of Granville is the river May, which joining with the river Cabbage, forms, together with the sea, the island of Edelano. The country lying upon the banks of the May was formerly inhabited by an Indian nation called the Vestoes. In it also is a pleasant lake, and delightful valley. Port-Royal river lies about 15 miles to the northwards of the river May: it has a bold entrance, and 17 feet in depth on the bar at low water. The harbour is large, commodious, and safe for shipping; and it runs up into a fine fruitful country, preferable to any other parts of Carolina. It loses itself, by various branches, into other large rivers. This port lies not above 180 miles from St. Augustine.

GRANVILLE-COUNTY, in the district of Hillsborough, in North Carolina, and is one of the most northern subdivisions of the province. It is divided from Virginia in some parts by the river Roanoke, by which it has communication with the sea.

GRASIVAUDAN, in Latin Pagus Gratianopolitanus, a subdivision of Upper Dauphiny, in France. It lies between mountains along the rivers Here or Drac, being bounded to the N. W.

by

by Viennois, to the N. and N. E. by Savoy, to the E. by Briançonnois, to the S. E. by Ambrunois, and to the S. by Gapençois and part of Diois; the rest of which, with Valentinois, bounds it to the W. This district is very populous, containing several villages, and but one considerable city, namely, Grenoble, and the capital of all Dauphiny.

GRASSE, a town of France, in Provence, with a bishop's see, seated on an eminence, 15 miles W. of Nice, and 70 N. E. of Aix. Long. 10, 1, E. Lat. 43, 39, E.

GRASSE, a town of France, in Languedoc, and in the diocese of Carcassonne, seated on the river Orbieu, at the foot of the mountains of Corbiere.

GRATIAS A DIOS. See GRACIAS.

GRATZ, or GRACZ, in Latin Gracium, a strong town of Lower Stiria, and the metropolis of the whole duchy, in the circle of Austria, in Germany. It lies on the river Muer; is defended by a wall, ramparts, and castle, upon a rocky hill, and other fortifications, that render it almost impregnable. The castle commands the neighbouring country, where is the archducal palace finely furnished, having a good library and cabinet of curiosities. Thither the court of Vienna have sometimes retired, when that city has been threatened with a siege. Here the Jesuits had a well-endowed college, reckoned among the universities of Germany, well filled with students; here is also the residence of the governor of Stiria, as it was formerly of the archdukes of Austria, who called themselves by its name. The suburbs are large, being washed by a rivulet called Gratz, and its territory is very populous. Here is the seat of the regency of Austria, and place of meeting generally for the states. In this town are two annual fairs; one in Midlent, and the other September 1, each lasting a fortnight. The nobility, who have several palaces here, are numerous, and the burghers wealthy; and it is frequented by people even from Hungary. In Gratz are several churches and convents, with an hospital; one of the former is a fine structure, with three towers. The Protestants had formerly churches, and a school here. The states arsenal is well stored; the town-house is a very fine building, and so are the archducal stables. The castle is well provided with cannon, and is of large extent. In it are two towers, and a chapel for the garrison. It lies 65 miles S. of Vienna. Lat. 47, 29, N. Long. 16, 10, E.

GRAVE, a fortified little town of Dutch Brabant, in the Netherlands, on the left side of the Maese. It confines on Cuyck, and is a very strong place both from its situation and its works.

G R

The Maese fills its ditches, which are broad and deep, surrounding the ramparts, which are about a mile in compass. They are flanked with five bastions, and defended by four half moons, besides the old walls and towers. On the other side of the river, and opposite to Grave, there is a crown-work to defend the passage of the river. These fortifications are regular, and kept in good repair. It has been often taken and re-taken; and the last time, in the year 1672, the torrent of French invasion swept it away into the power of Lewis XIV. But in 1674 it surrendered to the prince of Orange, the states having made it an hereditary fief for ever in that family. Grave contains only 400 houses, most of them old, with some caserns or barracks for the garrison, and two churches. It lies 10 miles S. of Nimuegen. Lat. 51, 56, N. Long. 5, 56, E.

GRAVELINES, a small fortified town of French Flanders, at the mouth of the Aa, forming its harbour, into which only small vessels can come. In 1384 the English took and burnt the place. In 1528 the emperor Charles V. fortified it. In 1558 the French were defeated near it by the Spaniards. In 1644 Gaston of France, Brother of Lewis XIII. took it; but the archduke Leopold re-took it in 1652; but the French having re-taken it in 1658, it was at last ceded to them by the treaty of the Pyrennees. In 1694 the English fleet laid it entirely in ashes. Here is but one parochial church. It lies 10 miles E. of Calais, and 13 S. W. of Dunkirk. Lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 9, 27, E.

GRAVENEC, a town of Suabia, in Germany, the capital of a county bearing its name, 26 miles W. of Ulm, in lat. 48, 36, N. and long. 9, 27, E.

GRAVESANDE, formerly a considerable town, but now only a village, of Holland, beyond Houssaardyck, and not far from the mouth of the Maese. In 1546, on digging up some old foundations, several curious earthen vessels, supposed to be 1400 years old, were found in this place. The neighbouring country produces excellent wheat, and its grass makes the cheese of Gravesande to be highly esteemed. The adjacent estate belongs to the prince of Orange; but the king of Prussia has the palace of Houssaardyck, as joint heir to king William III.

GRAVESEND, a small village on Long Island in America, between Utrecht and Flatland, situated in a bay of the same name.

GRAVESEND, a town lying upon the N. side of Kent, on the river Thames. It is a corporation, together with Milton, governed by a portreeve. In the reign of king Richard II. the French and and Spaniards came up the Thames in their galleys, plundered and burnt the place, carrying off its inhabitants; in compensation of which loss, that prince granted Gravesend and Milton the sole privilege of carrying passengers by water to London at four shillings the whole fare, or two-pence a head; but the price now is nine-pence each passenger in the tilt-boat, and a shilling in a wherry or small boat. Here is the great ferry, as it is called, between London and East Kent, vast numbers passing every tide between Gravesend and Billingsgate, a bell being publicly rung at each place every time of high water, for the boats that carry passengers, to put off directly. Besides other excellent regulations at Gravesend, all vessels outward bound from London, must undergo a second clearing from an officer of the customs; and from hence they generally take their departure, and commonly take in their provisions, lying opposite to Tilbury fort, on the Essex side: since the erection of which, the platforms raised here and at Milton by King Henry VIII. have been demolished. And on the Gravesend side is a blockhouse, where the centinel gives notice of any vessel coming down, by firing his piece: but with regard to ships coming in, they all go by without any notice taken, unless to put waiters on board, which wait at a place called New Tavern, just below the town. In Gravesend is a very handsome charity, which was given in 1624 by one Mr. Pinnock, of 21 dwellings, and a house for a master weaver to employ the poor. Here is also a charity-school for 24 boys, who are taught and clothed. Weekly markets are kept here on Wednesdays and Saturdays: its annual fairs are April 23, and November 25, holding for a week. The lands near the town having been lately turned into kitchen gardens, supply the towns for several miles round.

In August 1727, the church and greatest part of Gravesend were burnt down by an accidental fire; but having been since rebuilt to better advantage, the former by act of parliament, as one of the 50 new churches, and 5000*l.* given for that purpose by the public. It lies on the S. side of the Thames, 30 miles from London by water. In 1780 a military road was made from Cox-heath to this town, and every thing requisite to transport an army to the Essex shore, was got in readiness here, in case of an invasion on the northern coasts. It is 23 miles from London by land.

GRAUDENTZ, a pleasant little town, strongly walled, in the palatinate of Culm and Royal Prussia, in Poland. Its Latin name is Grudentum, the Poles pronounce it Grodgeonc. It has a castle on an eminence by the river side, with walls and towers of brick. In 1703 the Swedes took, plundered, and dismantled the place, and afterwards a garrison of Polish confederates were driven out by the Muscovites in 1707. It lies at the confluence of the Vistula and Ossa; and over the former river is a ferry. It lies 36 miles W. of Thorn, and 46 S. of Dantzick.

GRAVINA, an episcopal town of the province of Bari, and kingdom of Naples; in Lower Italy. It lies at the foot of the mountains, 30 miles S. W. of the city of Bari. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 17, 12, E.

GRAY, in Latin Gradicum, a town of the Franche Comté, in France, on the river Saone, by means of which they drive a good trade, loading vessels here with wheat and iron for Lyons. It is advantageously situated, and had formerly, when in the possession of the house of Austria, noble fortifications; but these Lewis XIV. demolished. Here are a presidial court, collegiate church, and but one parish, with three convents of monks, and a college that, till lately, belonged to the Jesuits. It contains about 4000 inhabitants, and is the principal place of one of the four great bailiwicks of the county, having within its district, it is said, 803 cities, boroughs, or villages. It lies nine leagues N. W. of Besançon.

GRAYS, Thurrock-Magna, or Grays-Thurrock, a market town of Essex, with a weekly market on Thursdays; its annual fair is on May 23. It lies nine miles from Barking, and 25 from London.

GREAT BRITAIN, the general name under which England and Scotland, with Wales, have been included, particularly since the union of both kingdoms in 1707: though in king James I.'s time that monarch endeavoured to introduce it, as in him centered the right to both crowns. See ENGLAND.

GREAT CHART, a village in Kent, with a fair on March 25.

GREAT THURLOW, a village in Suffolk, with a fair on October 10.

GREECE, the present Rumelia, and in many respects one of the most deservedly celebrated countries in the world, was anciently bounded on the N. by Macedonia, and the river Strymon; on the W. by the Ionian sea; on the S. by the Mediterranean; and on the E. by the Egean sea and Archipelago. It extended from the Strymon, by which it was parted from Thrace, to the promontory of Tenarus, the southmost point of the Peloponnesus, now the Morea, about lat. 6, 20, or nearly 440 English miles, and in breadth from E. to W. about 359 miles.

The general names by which the inhabitants of this this country were known to the ancients, were those of Graioi, or Graicoi, from whence the name of Greece is plainly derived.

The inhabitants of Greece in the first ages, even by the confession of their own historians, appear to have been savages scarce a degree removed from brutes. They lived indifferently on every fruit, herb, or root, that came in their way; and lay either in the open fields, or at best sheltered themselves in dens, caves, and hollow trees; the country itself in the mean time remaining one continued uncultivated desert. The first improvement they made in their way of living, was the exchanging of their old food for the more wholesome acorns, building huts for themselves to sleep in, and covering their bodies with the skins of beasts. For all this, it seems they were beholden to Pelasgius, (supposed by some to be Peleg spoke of in Scripture,) and who was highly revered by them on that account. This reformation in their way of life, however, it seems wrought none in their manners. On the contrary, they who had nothing to fight for but a hole to sleep in, began now to envy and rob one another of these slender acquisitions. This, in process of time, put them under a necessity of joining themselves into companies under some head, that they might either more safely plunder their neighbours, or preserve what they had got. Laws they had none, except that of the sword; so that those only lived in safety who inhabited the most barren and craggy places, and hence Greece for a long time, had no settled inhabitants, the weaker being always turned out by the stronger. Their gigantic size and strength, if we may believe Plutarch, added so much to their insolence and cruelty, that they seemed to glory in committing the greatest acts of violence and barbarity on those that unhappily fell into their hands.

The next advance towards civilization, was their forming themselves into regular societies, to cultivate the lands, and build themselves towns and cities for their safety. Their original barbarity and mutual violences against each other naturally prevented them from uniting as one nation, or even in to any considerable community; and hence originated the great number of states into which Greece was divided. The most remarkable of these small principalities mentioned in history are the following: In Peloponnesus were those of Sicyon, Argos, Messenia, Achaia Propria, Arcadia, and Laconia. In Grecia Propria, (that part of Greece which lay without Peloponnesus,) were those of Attica, Megara, Boeotia, Locris, Epichnemidia, Doris, Phocis, Locris, Ozolæa, and Ætolia. In Epirus were the Molossi, Amphiloci, Cassiopæi,

VOL. I.—No. 50.

Dræopes, Chaoces, Threspotii, Almeni, and Acarnani. In Thessaly were those of Thessalotis, Estiotis, Pelasgiotis, Magnesia, and Phthia. All these have at one time or other been severally governed by kings of their own, though we only find the names of many of them mentioned in the histories of the more considerable kingdoms of Sparta, Attica, Thebes, &c. The erection of these kingdoms, however, for some time, did not much alter the case; the inhabitants of the new kingdoms plundered and destroyed one another without mercy. Attica was the only place in any degree free from these incursions, because it was naturally destitute of every thing that could invite a plundering enemy; but those cities fared much worse which were situated on the sea-coasts, because they were in continual danger of being plundered either by sea or land; for pirates at that time did not less infest all those seas, than robbers did the land. And this was one main cause why most of the ancient cities of Greece were situated at some considerable distance from the shore; but even in these, as all their safety consisted in the resistance they could make against an invader, their inhabitants were under a necessity of going constantly armed, and being ever on their guard.

During this period of savage barbarity, the most renowned Grecian heroes, as Hercules, Theseus, &c. performed their exploits; which however exaggerated by poetic fiction, no doubt had a foundation in truth.

The first expedition in which we find the Greeks united, was that against Troy. Their success here (which happened about 1184, B. C.) cost them very dear; vast numbers of their bravest warriors being slain; great numbers of the survivors being cast away in their return; and many of those who had the good luck to get back again, being soon after murdered or driven out of their country. It is probable, however, that their having staid for such a long time in Asia, might contribute to civilize the Greeks somewhat sooner than what they otherwise would have been; and accordingly from this time, we find their history somewhat less obscure, and as it were beginning to emerge out of darkness. The continual wars indeed, in which they were engaged among themselves, no doubt, for a long time, prevented them from making any considerable progress in those arts in which they afterwards made so great figure. These wars, which indeed never ceased as long as the Greeks preserved their liberty, rendered them brave, and skilled in the military art, above all other nations; but at the same time, they effectually prevented them from making permanent conquests, and confined them within the bounds of their their own country; while the different states were one way or other so equally balanced, that scarce one of them was able perfectly to subdue another.

The Spartans, however, having, with great difficulty, reduced the kingdom of Messene, and added its territories to their own, became the leading people in Greece. Their superiority was long disputed by Athens, but the Peloponnesian war at last determined that point in favour of the Spartans, when the city of Athens was taken, and its walls demolished by Lysander the Spartan general. By the battle of Leuctra, the Spartans lost that superiority which they had maintained for 500 years, and which now devolved on the Thebans. After the death of Epaminondas, the celebrated Theban general, the Thebans were again obliged to yield the superiority to the Spartans. But by this time the Greeks had become acquainted with the luxuries and elegancies of life; and all the rigour of their original laws could not prevent them from valuing these as highly as other people. The Persians, whose power they had long dreaded, and who were unable to resist them by force of arms, at last found out (by the advice of Alcibiades) the proper method of reducing the Grecian power; namely, by assisting them by turns, and supplying one state with money to fight against another, till they should all be so much reduced, that they might become an easy prey. Philip of Macedon, entered into the same political views; and partly by intrigue, partly by force, got himself declared generalissimo of Greece. His successor, Alexander the Great, completed their subjection; and by destroying the city of Thebes, and exterminating its inhabitants, struck such a terror throughout Greece, that he was as fully obeyed by all the states, as by any of the rest of his subjects.

Soon after the battle of Selasia, the Greeks began to feel the weight of a power more formidable than any which they had yet experienced; namely, that of the Romans. That insidious and haughty republic, first intermeddled with the Grecian affairs, under pretence of setting them at liberty from the oppression of Philip of Macedon. This by a proper union among themselves, they might have accomplished; but in this they acted as though they had been infatuated; receiving with the utmost joy the decree of the Roman consul, who declared them free; without considering, that he who had thus given them liberty, might take it away at his pleasure. This lesson, however, they were soon taught, by the total reduction of their country to a Roman province. After their conquest by the Romans, they made no united effort to recover their liberty. They continued in quiet subjection, till the beginning of the 15th century. About that time they began to suffer under the tyranny of the Turks, and their sufferings were completed by the taking of Constantinople in 1453. Since that time, they have groaned under the yoke of a most despotic government; so that all traces of their former valour, ingenuity and learning are now in a manner totally extinct.

Modern Greece comprehends Macedonia, Albania now called Arnaut, Epirus, Thessaly now Jana, Achaia now Livadia, the Peloponnesus now Morea, together with the islands on its coast, and in the Archipelago. The continent of Greece is seated betwixt the 36th and 43d deg. of N. lat. and between the 19th and 27th deg. of long. E. of London. To the N. it is bounded by Bulgaria and Servia, from which it is divided by a ridge of mountains; to the S. by the Mediterranean sea; to the E. by Romania and the Archipelago; and to the W. by the Adriatic or gulph of Venice. Its length is said to be about 400 miles, and its utmost breadth about 350. The air is extremely temperate and healthy; and the soil fruitful, though badly cultivated, yielding corn, wine, delicious fruits, and abounding with cattle, fowls, and venison. As to religion, Christianity was planted in Greece soon after the death of our Saviour, and flourished there for many ages in great purity; but since the Greeks became subject to the Turkish yoke, they have sunk into the most deplorable ignorance, in consequence of the slavery and thralldom under which they groan, and their religion is now greatly corrupted. It is indeed little better than a heap of ridiculous ceremonies and absurdities. The head of the Greek church is the patriarch of Constantinople; who is chosen by the neighbouring archbishops and metropolitans, and confirmed by the emperor or grand vizir. He is a person of Great dignity, being the head and director of the eastern church. The other patriarchs are those of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Alexandria. Mr. Tournesort tells us, that the patriarchates are now generally set to sale, and bestowed upon those who are the highest bidders. The patriarchs, metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops, are always chosen from among the Caloyers or Greek monks.

GREEN, a village in Suffex, eight miles N. W. of Horsham, with two fairs on August 21, and Monday before July 5.

GREENCASTLE, anciently a strong castle, in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It lies on the sea side, and was a fortified garrison in the rebellion of 1641; also, preceding that era, it was looked upon as a place of such importance to the crown of England in Hen. VII's time, that none but an Englishman could be be trusted to be constable of it. It lies four miles from Ross-Trevor.

GREENFIELD, a village in Connecticut, New England, totally destroyed by the British forces July 6, 1779.

GREEN-ISLAND, or SERPENT-ISLAND, one of the lesser Virgin-Isles, which is claimed by the Spaniards, and situated near the east end of Porto Rico.

GREENLAND, a general name by which are denoted the most easterly parts of America, stretching towards the north pole, and likewise some islands to the northward of the continent of Europe, lying in very high latitudes.

This country is divided into West and East Greenland. West Greenland is now determined by our latest maps to be a part of the continent of America, though upon what authority is not very clear. That part of it which the Europeans have any knowledge of is bounded on the W. by Baffin's bay, on the S. by Davis's straits, and on the E. by the northern part of the Atlantic ocean. The coast abounds with inlets, bays, and large rivers, and is surrounded with a vast number of islands of different dimensions. The principal river, called Baal, falls into the sea in the 64th degree of latitude, where the first Danish lodge was built in 1721, and has been navigated above 40 miles up the country.

West Greenland was first peopled by Europeans in the eighth century. At that time, a company of Icelanders, headed by one Ericke Rande, were by accident driven on the coast. On his return he represented the country in such a favourable light, that some families again followed him thither, where they soon became a very thriving colony, and bestowed on their new habitation the name of Groenland, or Greenland, on account of its verdant appearance. This colony was converted to Christianity by a missionary from Norway, sent thither by the celebrated Olaf, the first Norwegian monarch who embraced the Christian religion. The Greenland settlement continued to increase and thrive under his protection; and, in a little time, the country was provided with many towns, churches, convents, bishops, &c. under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Drontheim. A considerable commerce was carried on between Greenland and Norway, and a regular intercourse maintained between the two countries till the year 1406, when the last bishop was sent over. From that time all correspondence was cut off, and all knowledge of Greenland has been buried in oblivion. It is supposed the colony was cut off by the natives called Schrellings.

All that can be learned from the most authentic records is, that Greenland was divided into two districts, called West Bygd, and East Bygd; that the western division contained four parishes, and 100 villages; that the eastern district was still more flourishing, as being nearer Iceland, sooner settled, and more frequented by shipping from Norway. This colony, in ancient times, certainly comprehended 12 extensive parishes, 190 villages, a bishop's see, and two monasteries. The present inhabitants of the western district are entirely ignorant of this part, from which they are divided by rocks, mountains, and deserts. Several attempts were made to discover the eastern district; and in 1576 captain Martin Forbisher was sent by queen Elizabeth. He descried the land, but could not reach it, and therefore returned to England; yet not before he had sailed 60 leagues in the strait which still retains his name, and landed on several islands, where he had some communication with the natives. He had likewise taken possession of the country in the name of queen Elizabeth, and brought away some pieces of heavy black stone, from which the refiners of London extracted a certain proportion of gold. He made two more voyages, with an intent to form a settlement, but miscarried. Two of the natives he brought to England.

Christian IV. king of Denmark, being desirous of discovering the old Greenland settlement, sent three ships thither, under the command of captain Godske Lindenow; who is said to have reached the E. coast of Greenland, where he traded with the savage inhabitants, such as they are still found in the western district, but saw no signs of a civilized people. Lindenow kidnapped two of the natives, who were conveyed to Copenhagen.

Other expeditions of the same nature have been planned and executed with the same bad success, under the auspices of a Danish company of merchants. At length the Greenland company at Bergen in Norway transported a colony to the western coast, about the 64th degree of latitude; and these Norwegians sailed in the year 1712, accompanied by the reverend Hans Egede, to whose care, ability, and precision, we owe the best and most authentic account of modern Greenland.

His Danish majesty, in the year 1728, caused horses to be transported to Greenland, in hope that the settlers might, by their means, travel over land to the eastern district; but the icy mountains were found impassable.

Mr. Egede is of opinion, that the only practicable method of reaching that part of the country, will be to coast north about in small vessels between the great flakes of ice and the shore, as the Greenlanders have declared, that the currents continually rushing from the bays and inlets, and running south-westwards along the shore, hinder the the ice from adhering to the land; so that there is always a channel open, through which vessels of small burden might pass, especially if lodges were built at convenient distances on the shore, for the convenience and direction of the adventurers.

That part of the country which is now visited and settled by the Danes and Norwegians, lies between the 64th and 68th degrees of N. lat. and thus far, it is said, the climate is temperate. In the summer, which continues from the end of May to the middle of September, the weather is warm and comfortable, while the wind blows easterly; though even at this time storms frequently happen, which rage with incredible violence; and the sea coasts are infested with fogs that are equally disagreeable and unhealthy. Near the shore, and in the bays and inlets, the low land is clothed with the most charming verdure; but the inland mountains are perpetually covered with ice and snow. To the northward of the 68th degree of latitude, the cold is prodigiously intense; and towards the end of August all the coast is covered with ice, which never thaws till April or May, and sometimes not till the latter end of June.

Greenland is seldom visited with thunder and lightning, but the Aurora Borealis is very frequent and bright. At the time of new and full moon, the tide rises and falls upon this coast about three fathoms; and it is remarkable, that the springs and fountains on shore rise and fall with the flux and reflux of the ocean.

The soil of Greenland varies like that of all other mountainous countries. The hills are very barren, being indeed frozen throughout the whole year; but the vallies and low grounds, especially near the sea, are rich and fruitful. The ancient Norwegian chronicles inform us, that Greenland formerly produced a great number of cattle, and that considerable quantities of butter and cheese were exported to Norway; and, on account of their peculiar excellency, set apart for the king's use. The same histories inform us, that some parts of the country yielded excellent wheat; and that large oaks were found here, which carried acorns as large as apples. Some of these oaks still remain in the southern parts, and in many places the marks of ploughed land are easily perceived. At present, however, the country is destitute of corn and cattle, though in many places it produces excellent pasture. Turneps and coleworts of an excellent taste and flavour are also produced here. Among the fruits of Greenland, we number juniper-berries, blue-berries, bil-berries, and bramble-berries.

Greenland is thought to contain many mines of metal, though none of them are wrought. To the southward of the Danish colony are some appearances of a mine of copper. Mr. Egede once received a lump of ore from one of the natives; and here he found calamine of a yellow colour. He once sent a considerable quantity of sand of a yellow colour, intermixed with streaks of vermilion, to the Bergen company. They probably found their account in this present; for they desired him by a letter to procure as much of that sand as possible; but he was never able to find the place where he saw the first specimen. It was one of the smallest among a great number of islands; and the mark he had set up was blown down by a violent storm. Possibly this might be the same mineral of which capt. Forbisher brought so much to England. This country produces rock-crystals both red and white, and whole mountains of the asbestos or incombustible flax. All round the colony, which is known by the name of Good Hope, they find a kind of bastard marble, of various colours, which the natives form into bowls, lamps, pots, &c. All that has been said of the fertility of Greenland, however, must be understood only of that part which lies between the 60th and 65th degrees of latitude. The most northern parts are totally destitute of herbs and plants. The wretched inhabitants cannot find grass in sufficient quantities to stuff in their shoes to keep their feet warm, but are obliged to buy it from those who inhabit the more southern parts.

The animals which abound most in Greenland are rein deer, foxes, hares, dogs, and white bears. The natives keep a great number of dogs, which are large, white or speckled, and rough, with ears standing upright, as is the case with all the dogs peculiar to cold climates. In the northern parts the natives yoke them in sledges, which, though heavy laden, they will draw on the ice at the rate of 70 miles in a short winter's day. Here are also found great numbers of ravens, eagles of a prodigious size, falcons, and other birds of prey; and likewise a kind of linnet. Whales, sword-fish, porpoises, &c. abound on the coasts; also holybut, turbot, cod, haddock, &c. The more dubious animals also, called mermaids, sea-serpents, and krakens, said to be found on the coast of Norway, are said likewise to dwell in these seas. Mr. Egede assures us, that, in the year 1734, the sea serpent was seen off the new Danish colony, and raised its head mast-high above the surface of the water.

The people who now inhabit the western coast of Greenland, and who, without doubt, are the descendants of the ancient Schrellings, who exterminated the first Iceland colony, bear a near resemblance to the Samoides and Laplanders in their persons, complexions, and way of life. They are short, brawny, and inclined to corpulency; with with broad faces, flat noses, thick lips, black hair and eyes, and a yellowish, tawny complexion. They are for the most part vigorous and healthy, but remarkably short lived. They are subject to a weakness in the eyes, occasioned by the piercing winds and the glare of the snow in the winter-time. The leprosy is known among them, but is not contagious. Those that dwell in the northern parts are miserably tormented with dysenteries, rheums, and pulmonary disorders, boils, and epilepsy. In their dispositions the Greenlanders are cold, phlegmatic, indolent, and slow of apprehension; but very quiet, orderly, and good-natured. They live peaceably together; and have every thing in common, without strife, envying, or animosity. They are civil and hospitable, but slovenly to a degree almost beyond the Hottentots themselves.

All the Greenlanders hitherto known speak the same language, though different dialects prevail in different parts of the country. They are employed all the year round in fishing or hunting. At sea they pursue whales, morse, seals, fish for eating, and sea fowl. On shore they hunt the rein deer in different parts of the country.

This country is but thinly inhabited. In the winter time the people dwell in huts built of stone or turf. In the summer-time they dwell in tents made of long poles fixed in a conical form, covered in the inside with deer skins, and on the outside with seal skins, dressed so that the rain cannot pierce them.

East Greenland was for a long time considered as a part of the continent of West Greenland, but is now discovered to be an assemblage of islands lying between 76, 46, and 80, 30, of N. latitude, and between 9 and 20, of E. longitude. It was discovered by Sir Hugh Willoughby in 1553, who called it Groenland, supposing it to be a part of the western continent. In 1595 it was again visited by William Barentz and John Cornelius, two Dutchmen, who pretended to be the original discoverers, and called the country Spitzbergen, or Sharp Mountains, from the many sharp-pointed and rocky mountains with which it abounds. They alledged that the coast discovered by Sir Hugh Willoughby was some other country, which accordingly the Hollanders delineated on their maps and charts by the name of Willoughby Land, whereas in fact no such land ever existed; and long before the voyage of these Dutchmen, Stephen Barrows, an English shipmaster, had coasted along a desolate country from N. lat. 78, 0, to 80, 11, which was undoubtedly Spitzbergen. The sea in the neighbourhood of the islands of Spitzbergen abounds very much with whales, and is the common resort of the whale-fishing ships from different countries; and the country itself is frequently visited by these ships; but till the late voyage of captain Phipps, by order of his British Majesty, the situation of it was erroneously laid down. It was imagined that the land stretched to the northward as far as 82 of N. lat. but captain Phipps found the most northerly point of land, called Seven Islands, not to exceed 80, 30, of latitude. Towards the E. he saw other lands lying at a distance, so that Spitzbergen plainly appeared to be surrounded by water on that side, and not joined to the continent of Asia, as former navigators had supposed. The N. and W. coasts also he explored, but was prevented by the ice from sailing so far to the northward as he wished. The coast appeared neither habitable nor accessible. It is formed of high, barren, black rocks, without the least marks of vegetation; in many places bare and pointed; in others covered with snow, appearing even above the clouds. The vallies between the high cliffs were filled with snow and ice. The current ran along this coast half a knot an hour, north. The height of one mountain seen here was found by geometrical mensuration to be at one time 1503½ feet, at another 1503½ feet. By a barometer constructed after De Luc's method, the height was found to be 1588½ feet.

There is good anchorage in Schmeerenburg harbour, lying in N. latitude 74, 44, E. long. 9, 50, in 13 fathoms, sandy bottom, not far from the shore, and well sheltered from all winds. Close to this harbour is an island, called Amsterdam Island, where the Dutch used formerly to boil their whale oil; and the remains of some conveniences erected by them for that purpose are still visible. The Dutch ships still resort to this place for the latter season of the whale fishery. The stone about this place is chiefly a kind of marble, which dissolves easily in the marine acid. There were no appearances of minerals of any kind, nor any signs of ancient or modern volcanoes. No insects, or any species of reptiles, were seen, nor even the common earth-worm. There were no springs or rivers; but great plenty of water was produced from the snow which melted on the mountains.

The most remarkable views which these dreary regions present are those called Icebergs, which are large bodies of ice filling the valleys between the high mountains.

These islands are totally uninhabited, though it doth not appear but that human creatures could subsist on them, notwithstanding their vicinity to the pole. Eight English sailors, who were accidentally left here by a whale-fishing ship, survived the winter, and were brought home next season. The Dutch then attempted to settle a colony on Amsterdam Island above mentioned; but all the people perished, not through the severity of the climate, but of the scurvy, owing to the want of those remedies which are now happily discovered, and which are found to be so effectual in preventing and curing that dreadful disease. The late account also of six Russian sailors who staid four years in this inhospitable country, affords a decisive proof, that a colony might be settled on East Greenland, provided the doing so could answer any good purpose.

GREENLAW, the shire-town of Berwickshire, in the S. of Scotland, with a weekly market; and yet it is only a burgh of regality.

GREENOCK, a handsome town in the shire of Renfrew, in Scotland, on the frith of Clyde, where it receives the river of the latter name. It has a good harbour of hewn stone. It is also noted for being the seat of the West-country herring-fishery, where is a convenient house for the royal company of fishermen. It is an excellent road for shipping to and from Glasgow, as the Downs is with regard to London, with a castle commanding it. It lies 12 miles from Paisley, and 6 from Dumbarton by water.

GREEN-STREET, a village in Kent, with a fair on May 1.

GREENWICH Kent, five miles from London, has been the birth-place and seat of several of our sovereigns. Queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, were born here, as was king Edward VI. who died here. Their palace was first erected by Humphry, duke of Gloucester, who named it placentia, and began the tower on the top of the steep hill in the park, which was finished by Henry VII. but afterwards demolished, and a royal observatory erected in its place by king Charles II. furnished with mathematical instruments for astronomical observations and a deep dry well for observing the stars, in the day-time. The palace was enlarged by Henry VII. but completed by Henry VIII. This being afterwards much neglected, king Charles II. who had enlarged the park, walled it about, and planted it, pulled the palace down and began another, of which he lived to see the first wing magnificently finished. But king William III. granted it, with 9 acres of ground thereto belonging, to be converted into an hospital for old and disabled seamen, the widows and children of those who lost their lives in the service, and for the encouragement of navigation. The wing, which cost king Charles 36,000*l.* is now the first wing of the hospital towards London; there is scarce such another foundation and fabric in the whole world. Its noble hall was finely painted by the late Sir James Thornhill. At the upper end, in an alcove, are paintings of the late princes

Sophia, king George I. the queen dowager of Prussia, queen Caroline, and king George II. the late princess dowager of Wales, the duke of Cumberland, and their five royal sisters. On the ceiling, over that alcove, are the late queen Anne and prince George of Denmark: on the ceiling of the hall are king William III. and queen Mary; and there is a fine statue of king George II. on a pedestal, in the area fronting its noble terrace by the Thames. In the year 1705 was the first admission of 100 disabled seamen into this hospital, which is now augmented to 900 men and 90 boys. To every hundred pensioners six nurses are allowed, who are to be seamen's widows, at 10*l.* a year, and 2*s.* a week more for those who attend in the infirmary. The pensioners, besides their commons, are allowed 1*s.* a week to spend; and the common warrant officers 1*s.* 6*d.* The several benefactions to this noble charity, which appear in tables hung up at the entrance of the hall, amount to a great sum. And in the year 1732, the late earl of Derwentwater's forfeited estate, amounting to near 6000*l.* a year, was given to it by parliament. Its parish church lately rebuilt, as one of the 50 new ones, is a very handsome structure; and here are two charity-schools. There is also a handsome college, at the end of the town fronting the Thames, for the maintenance of 20 decayed old house-keepers, 12 out of Greenwich, and eight who are to be presented alternately from Snotisham and Castle-Rising in Norfolk, or else from Bungay in Suffolk. This is called the duke of Norfolk's college, and was founded and well endowed in 1613. The pensioners, besides victuals and drink, are allowed 1*s.* 6*d.* a week for necessities, with a gown every year, linen once in two years, and hats once in four years. Mr. Lambard, author of the Perambulation of Kent, also built an hospital here in 1560, called queen Elizabeth's college, in which are 20 poor, said to be the first hospital of the kind built by any English protestant. The town contains 1450 houses, and a market on Wednesday and Saturday was erected here in 1737, the direction of which is in the governors of the royal hospital, to which the profits arising from it were to be appropriated. That which is properly the palace here is but small, and converted into apartments for the governor of the royal hospital and the ranger of Greenwich-park, which is well stocked with deer, and has a noble and most delightful prospect of the city of London, and of the Thames. This is the chief harbour for the king's yachts.

The hospital had one of its quadrangles, containing its chapel and several wards, destroyed by a fire Jan. 2, 1779; but the whole has been restored agreeable to its former plan.

GREENWICH,

G R

GREENWICH, a town in Greenwich township, Rhode Island, on the W. bank of Narraganset-bay, opposite which is Hope Island.

GREENWICH, a town in West Jersey, in Cumberland county, 15 miles S. W. from Salem, and 34 S. of Philadelphia, about 4 miles from the Delaware river.

GREENWICH, a town at the W. extremity of Fairfield county, Connecticut, three miles W. from Rye, and seven E. from Stamford, on the coast of Long-Island Sound, off which lie Patrick's-Isles.

GRENADE, in Latin, Granata, a town in the district of Tursan and Gascony, in France. It lies on the river Adour, which in winter begins here to be navigable. Its situation is two leagues below Aire, and is at the same distance from St. Sever.

GRENOBLE, a genteel and noble city of Graisivaudan, and Upper Dauphiny, in France. It lies in a plain, at the foot of the mountains, on the confluence of the Isere and Drac. Its Latin name is Gratianopolis, and it anciently belonged to the Allobroges. It is the seat of a parliament, a governor, and lieutenant-general. It was fortified by M. la Ville, and is commanded by a fort called La Bastille. The Isere divides Grenoble into two unequal parts. It is the see of a bishop, in whose diocese are contained 64 parishes of Savoy, and 240 in Dauphiny. The episcopal palace is a noble structure, the principal in the place, and decorated with paintings. The skins and gloves of Grenoble are very much valued; yet their woollen stuffs, of which they make great quantities here, are but coarse. In this whole diocese is only one abbey of Cistercian nuns, namely Hayes, and the famous La Grande Chatreuse, head of the Carthusian Monks, which was founded by St. Bruno. In Grenoble most shocking barbarities were committed on the Huguenots or Reformed, in the first religious war of 1562. It lies 40 miles S. W. of Chambery, and 50 S. E. of Lyons. Lat. 45, 26, N. Long. 5, 34, E.

GRENVILLE, (inlet,) a small harbour with a settlement on the E. coast of Florida, opposite the great Bahama bank; in Lat. 26, 40. Long. 81, 00. It will only allow vessels of 5 feet draught; to the N. of it, on the point at its entrance, lies a remarkable spot of rocks on the beach, as there is also at 1½ league to the northward of the said entrance; three leagues farther N. are several high blue or black rocks standing on the beach, which makes this part of the coast remarkable, as does likewise a hill inland, full of white spots; a little to the N. of the rocks, this hill is called Bald Head Mount, and more frequently the Bleach-yard. A small reef just under water, about half a mile from the shore, abreast of the high rocks, forms here a convenient little harbour for boats; there are two wells of excellent water in a little meadow, at the back of the sand hills, near a mile to the S. of the high rocks; the river St. Lucia likewise shews its mouth over the sand; the wells have casks in them, and this is a very good watering place for vessels which having had a tedious passage through the Gulph, are in want of a supply of this indispensable article. The island between the two inlets affords plenty of turtle, venison, and bear; likewise numerous quantities of wild ducks, each in their season; besides cocoa-plumbs, and palm-cabbage; and on the main opposite, turkeys are found in abundance. The coast is even, bold too, and the soundings regular. This is the southern extremity of the great bank of regular soundings, which lies before the eastern coast of Florida, and here the Gulph Stream comes very near the beach, the colour of the water changes from a muddy green to a beautiful Saxon blue.

GRESHOLM, one of the islands on the N. W. of Milford-haven, in Pembrokeshire, in S. Wales. See MILFORD-HAVEN.

GRESSENHALL, Norfolk, on the N. W. side of East-Deerham, has a fair on December 6.

GRESSFORD, Denbigh, has a fair on the second Monday in April, last Monday in August, and the first Monday in December.

GRETA, a river of Yorkshire; at the confluence of which with the Tees, and at a place called Merton, was the site of the ancient city of Catraclonium, the remains of it being still visible there, and about Greta-bridge.

GRETE, a river in Westmoreland, and Lancashire, and which falls into the Lune near Thurland-castle.

GRIFFENHAGEN, a town of Upper or Swedish Pomerania, in Germany, on the E. side of the Oder, above Stetin, and nearly opposite to Gratz. It lies low, and has been often taken and retaken, during the civil wars of the empire. By the treaty of Westphalia, it was ceded to Sweden; but by that of St. Germain-en-laye, in 1679, given to the elector of Brandenburg, in whose possession it still is. In 1532 it was unhappily burnt down. Its ecclesiastical jurisdiction extends over 23 parishes. Here are kept three annual fairs; namely, on Thursday after the first Sunday in Lent, on Trinity-Sunday, and on October 28.

GRIGNAN, a town of France, in Provence, on the confines of Dauphiny. Long. 5, 0, E. Lat. 44, 25, N.

GRIM, a place in the circle of Leipzig, and Saxony, in Germany, with a castle on the river

Mulda,

G R

Mulda, over which is a bridge. It is remarkable for a public school, which the elector Maurice founded at the Augustine convent, for 100 youths to be chosen out of the electorate, and endowed it with the revenues of the nunnery of Nimpschen in its neighbourhood. It has suffered greatly both by fire and floods. The Hussites plundered these parts about 1530; and 10 years afterwards the Swedes committed cruel ravages here. It lies 12 miles S. of Leipzig, and in the direct road from the secularized bishopric of Wurtzen to Colditz.

GRIMAUD, a small town of Provence, in France; the site of which was anciently much nigher the sea; so that the bay of St. Tropez had its name from it.

GRIMBERG, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands. It lies seven miles N. of Brussels. Lat. 51, 12, N. Long. 4, 22, E.

GRIMBERG, a city in the archbishopric of Triers, and circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany. It is the see of a bishop, and subject to the elector. It lies 20 miles S. E. of the city of Triers. Lat. 49, 31, N. Long. 6, 48, E.

GRIMSBY, (Great,) a mayor borough of Lincolnshire, not far from the mouth of the Humber. Its trade consists principally in bringing coals and salt by that river, and was very considerable before its harbour was choked up. Its church is large and sumptuous, has several streets and well-built houses, and anciently had two monasteries, a nunnery, and a castle. The mayor has a privilege of holding a court on Tuesday, and its two bailiffs on Friday. The weekly markets are kept on Wednesday and Saturday: its annual fairs are on June 17, and September 17. It sends two representatives to parliament, lies 30 from Lincoln, and 169 from London.

GRINNAA, or GRINSTADT a town of North Jutland, in Latin Grina. It stands near the point or cape of a peninsula, which juts out into the Categate. It lies seven miles from Ebelfot, to the N. and is defended by a castle.

GRINAW, an old castle of the Rheinthal, with apartments for lodging strangers, at the very extremity of the country, where the Lint falls into the Zurich-lake. Here is a bridge over the river, and a harbour for boats, where people stop who come from Zurich and the neighbourhood of its lake, and from hence are drawn on the Lint to Wessen, by means of horses.

GRINGLEY, (on the hill,) Nottinghamshire, on the W. side of Gainborough. It is a little town with a fair Dec. 12.

GRINSTED, (East,) in Sussex, 30 miles from London, seated on a hill, near the borders of Surry, near Ashdown forest. It has a handsome church, and the assizes for the county are sometimes held here. It is 18 miles N. of Lewes. An hospital in the reign of king James I. for 31 poor people of this town was built and endowed with 330l. a year. It is a borough by prescription, governed by a bailiff and his brethren, has sent burgesses to parliament ever since the first of Edward II. who are elected by about 35 burgageholders; had a charter for a monthly market from Henry VII. The returning officer here is the bailiff, who is chosen by a jury of burgageholders. Its market is on Thursday, and its fairs which are well frequented, are July 13, and Dec. 11.

GRIPSWALD, or GRIETSWALD, a well-built fortified town of Upper Pomerania, in Germany. It stands not far from the Baltic, at the bottom of a small gulph, called the sea of Stralsund, and opposite to the Isle of Rugen. It has a good trade by sea. The country round it being fruitful, they export great quantities of corn. Here is abundance of cattle, and they deal much in tallow and hides. The harbour is good, with several ships belonging to it, which are brought up to the quay by means of a canal cut from the gulph to a large lake on the other side of the place. Here is a good Protestant university, where many Swedish and Prussian youths are educated. It has been several times taken, and belongs now to the king of Prussia. In it are three parochial churches, and it had formerly two monasteries, one of which serves now for the university, and the other for its schools. Here are two annual fairs, on St. James's day and All-saints day. It lies 20 miles S. E. of Stralsund. Lat. 54, 49, N. Long. 14, 1, E.

GRIPSWALDISCHE OYE, an island six or seven miles off Gripswald, out at sea; but now mostly drowned. Here was formerly a wood where the inhabitants used to put their horses all winter; and a chapel in times of Popery, where the fishermen had mass said to them, before they went to catch their herrings, sturgeon, &c.

GRISON, one of the smaller Granadilla islands. It is situated between Diamond-isle and Cauriacon. It is not inhabited, having no fresh water.

GRISONS, a large and populous country in the very heart of the Alps, allies of the Swiss cantons. It is nearly of a circular form, being 60 miles over every way, between lat. 45, 47, N. and between long. 9, 11, E. It is bounded by Tirol and Saragans, on the W. by the cantons of Glaris and Uri, on the S. by the Italian bailiwicks of the cantons, the county of Chiavenna and the Valteline, and on the E. likewise by Tirol and Bormio. It is divided into three great parts, called the Leagues; namely, 1. The Upper or Grey League. 2. The League of Caddée (Cafa Dei), or the House of God. And, 3. The Leagues of the ten jurisdictions or communities. The two first of these lie to the S. and the third to the N. The first is separated in part from the second, by the eastern branch of the Rhine, and fronts the cantons of Uri and Glaris to the W. as the two others do Tirol to the E. and N. They are three distinct cantons or republics, with separate governments; only for their common defence they form one republican system, in which resides the sovereignty, though ultimately in the whole body of the people. The name Grisons they have from the first of them who made a league in the 15th century against their oppressors, wearing coarse grey coats made of a home-spun manufacture. This part of the country is that which the Romans called Rhætia Prima.

Except a very few royalties belonging to the nobility, the lands are exempt from all dues and payments whatever; nothing is paid here for importation or exportation; but every one enjoys the fruit of his own labour; and the revenue of his own land. Though the wine they drink is brought on horses four or five days journey, it is sold much cheaper than in most parts of Italy or France. Here are villages of 150 or 200 houses on the very tops of the mountains; and though there grows no sort of grain, and but little grass, for want of soil, yet the peasants keep between 3 and 400 horses for carriage; which turns to good account. The inns on the mountains are very good, and besides excellent bread and wine, there is a great quantity of game and venison, with good chambers and beds.

They have a peculiar way of dancing in troops with naked swords, without any hurt ensuing, a custom derived, they say, from their Tuscan ancestors, who danced thus at their Pagan sacrifices. They have many families that boast of great antiquity, who subsist by agriculture and other hard labour, thinking it no disgrace. The pensions which the government receives from foreign princes, and the revenues arising from their own dominions, principally from imposts upon goods carried through their country, are distributed among them man by man. They are all trained up to arms, being well furnished with them, and exercise themselves in these, especially on holidays, and are made use of like their neighbours the Swiss cantons, by many princes in their armies.

The subjects of the Grisons possess a fine country at the foot of the Alps, and near the entrance into Italy; consisting of three lordships, namely, the county of Bormio, the Valteline, and the county of Chiavenna. The whole is but one valley properly, which extends to the foot of the Rhetian Alps. It is bounded on the E. by Tirol, on the S. by the territories of Venice and Milan, and on the W. and N. by the Grisons. It is about 60 Italian miles long, not being above two broad in some places, and in others six or seven. The river Adda, which rises from Mount Braulio, and falls into the county of Bormio, whence it passes into the Valteline, and from that into the lake of Como, does the country a great deal of good, though sometimes overflowing it.

GRODEC, the name of four towns in Poland, the first of which is in Red Russia, the second in the Palatinate of Podolia, the third on the left bank of the Neister, and fourth in the palatinate, of Kioff.

GRODNO, a pretty large city of Lithuania, in Poland, partly on a hill near the river Niemen; and next to Wilna the best city in the duchy. It has neither towers, bastions, nor walls. The old castle here is surrounded with a deep ditch, one wing of which only can be inhabited; and has another large and new castle or citadel, regularly constructed on a rock, where it was ordered in 1673, that every third diet of Poland should be held, at which time 400 cats (pieces of money,) are usually paid for the use of four apartments in a house for six weeks only. Near the town is a well-built royal out-work. Over the Niemen or Cronon is the stateliest wooden-bridge in all Poland. The place has been often taken, and in 1753 almost entirely burnt down. It has a good trade, the merchandises of several parts of Lithuania being transported from hence to Dantzick. Here is a college with some convents. Three churches in Grodno are built of stone; one of which serves the Poles, and the other two the Russians, the latter having also in the suburbs one of timber and another of stone. The rest are only of timber; the bells are not hung in the churches, but in a wooden tower erected for the purpose before the gates. It lies 84 miles S. W. of Wilna. Lat. 53, 38, N. Long. 23, 52, E.

GROENDALE, a town of Brabant, in the Austrian Low Countries; it lies near the source of the river Ysche, eight miles S. E. of Brussels. Lat. 50, 48, N. Long. 4, 32, E.

GROENLAND. See GREENLAND.

GROJAS-ISLE, a small island, two leagues S. from the coasts of Labradore, and is about five leagues round. The N. end of it lies in lat. 51 deg and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Bellisle. Between it and the main, there are from 20 to 30 fathoms water.

GROINE, a name corruptedly given by our sailors to Corunna, a sea port of Galicia, in Spain. See CORUNNA.

GROLL, a small city of Zutphen and Guelderland, one of the United Provinces, on the little river river Sling. It is a fortified place, yet has been often taken; particularly in 1626, by prince Maurice, in which siege young prince William of Nassau was slain. It confines on the bishopric of Munster, and 19 miles E. of Zutphen. Lat. 52, 20, N. Long. 6, 39, E.

GROMBRIDGE, Kent, has a chapel of ease to its parish church at Speldhurst, fairs on May 17, and Sept. 25.

GRONEY, a river in Brecknockshire, which runs into the Uke by Langronev.

GRONINGEN, with the Ommelanden or circumjacent country, is in Latin, called Dominum Groningense, and Ommelandia, or Tractus Adjacens. It is one of the United Provinces of the Netherlands; bounded on the N. by the German Ocean, the county of Embden on the E. from which it is separated by the river Ems, and by the Dollart bay. It has Overissel on the S. and Friesland on the W. from which it is divided by the river Lawers. The greatest length of this lordship or province from S. E. to N. W. is about 47 miles; but is of unequal breadth, the greatest being about 33 miles; but that part of the province lying between Overissel and Embden, or rather part of Westphalia, is a very narrow tract.

The air here is sharp, and well-fanned by continual breezes. They have little stone or wood; but plenty of turf for firing. The country abounds with pasture grounds, large herds of great and small cattle, and but few wild beasts. Here is store of fresh and salt water fish. The natives are much of the same character with those of Friesland, only more industrious, owing to their trade and frequent commerce with strangers. Though in the treaty of union at Utrecht, and in some public acts since, Groningen be called only Ommeland, the style is generally Groningen and the Ommelanden.

That part of the province which belongs to the lordship of Groningen, contains

1. The lordship of Gorecht, a narrow tract in the middle of the province, in which stands Groningen, the capital of the province.

2. The Old Ampt, or bailiwick lying on the E. of Gorecht, and extending itself to the banks of the Dollart-bay. Its principal town is Winfchotten.

3. The Westervold, which lies S. of the Old Ampt, running out in the form of a wedge, between the county of Drent Overissel, and the N. part of the bishopric of Munster. In it are several villages, but no town of any note.

The Ommelanden, which is a subdivision of Groningen, includes also three districts; namely,

1. The Western quarter, lying between the river Lawers, which separates it from Friesland, and the river or channel leading to Groningen. It contains about 25 villages, but no town of any note.

2. Hunfingow, which comprehends all the N. part of the province, but has no considerable town. And,

3. Fivelingow, lying between Hunfingow on the N. and the Old Ampt on the S. Gorecht on the W. and the mouth of the river Ems on the E. In this district are several villages, and the town of Dam.

GRONINGEN, the capital of the whole province of its name above-mentioned. It lies on the river Aa, which is received into the city, and goes out again by several arches under the fortifications, where it receives the river Hunnes, which encompasses the E. and N. parts of the city, forming a harbour capable of receiving a great number of ships from the sea, by which it enjoys a pretty good trade. In Groningen are several natural and artificial canals. Within the town is a brick bridge, over the Aa. The place has 17 large bastions and other fortifications, with a broad ditch. The city is large and populous. It not only communicates with the sea, but also with the river Ems, by means of which it can carry on a trade with Westphalia. Its principal church is St. Martin, a fine structure, at one end of the great market, with a high tower. St. Mary's church stands at the end of the fish-market, and has also a very high tower, and harmonious-chimes. Here are three market places, the largest of which is the ox-market, surrounded with fine buildings; and among these are the town-house, exchange, and weigh-house. In the three market-places terminate 17 streets; six of which are in a straight line to the like number of gates. There are 27 spacious streets in all. Most of the houses in Groningen have pleasant gardens to them, with fruit-trees. It has been often taken but in 1672, they made such a brave resistance against the bishop of Munster, that, after the loss of 10,000 men, the prelate was at last obliged to raise the siege. The citizens are profuse in diet and habit, which has occasioned a law for regulating their expences at weddings, &c. Here is a university, with professors in all the faculties. In their library is a well attested inscription, that a soldier lived there 16 days, after receiving a wound in the right ventricle of the heart. They have also a public school for the languages with seven masters, who have each a house and a handsome salary. The prince's palace is on the N. side of the city, with a pictures of all the princes of Orange and counts of Nassau; also a fine garden near near it. This city is noted for giving birth to Rudolphus Agricola, whom Erasmus calls the greatest scholar that any age has produced; also to Veselin, his cotemporary so universally learned, that he was stiled Lux Mundi, 'the light of the world.' The famous Ubbo Emmius was the first rector of the university in 1614. Groningen lies 30 miles S. W. of Embden, and 33 E. of Leewarden. Lat. 53, 28, N. Long. 6, 31, E.

GROOMS-PORT, or GRAHAM'S-PORT, a place in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, with a quay for small vessels. Between this and Bangor, from which it lies two miles, is a fine sandy bay, called, Bally-holmbay.

GROSSETO, in Latin, Grossetum, Rosetum, a small episcopal city of Tuscany, and Middle Division of Italy. It rose from the ruins of the ancient Ruffellæ, near which it is built, and is but thinly peopled on account of its fenny grounds; has a good old castle, and some fine buildings. It lies on Castiglion-bay, S. of Florence, and about three miles from the river Ombrone to the W. Lat. 42, 36, N. Long. 12, 13, E.

GROTON, a town in Middlesex county, Massachusetts-bay, about 24 miles N. W. from Cambridge, at the head of a branch of the river Merimack, in the great road to Petersburg, in New Hampshire.

GROTON, in New London county, Connecticut, New England, about two miles E. of the river Thames, and the same N. of the sea-coast, off which lies Fisher's island.

GROTSKAW, (duchy of,) in the Upper Silesia, in Germany. It is also called the principality of Neiss, is bounded on the N. by the duchy of Brieg, on the E. by that of Oppelen, on the W. by the duchy of Munsterberg, and on the S. by Bohemia. It contains 12 towns, and so fruitful in corn and wood, that it is proverbially said, 'It is impossible that a Grotzkawer should starve.'

GROTSKAW, the capital of the last mentioned duchy in Silesia; a small town, mostly built of timber, only the bishop's palace, the church and town-house are of stone. It has good gates and walls, with a triple ditch; stands in a fine plain, a little W. of the river Neiss. Its parochial church is large. It has been twice burnt, the last time by lightning, and besides it has suffered much in the wars. It lies 28 miles S. of Breslaw. Lat. 50, 38, N. Long. 16, 56, E.

GROTSKA, or KROTSKA, an inconsiderable town of Servia, in European Turkey, about 24 miles S. E. of Belgrade. In its neighbourhood a battle was fought between the Turks and the queen of Hungary's troops in 1752, when the latter were obliged to retreat with loss. Here the earl of Crawford and other British gentlemen were present as volunteers. The former, by too much ardour, received a wound in the thigh, from a musket-ball, so that ever after, though one of the genteel men in the kingdom, and in the bloom of youth, was forced to go upon crutches, as the shot had not been extracted quite, the wound broke out every now and then; and what by frequent incisions, and the most excruciating pains, he at length died of it. Lat. 45 20, N. Long. 20, 51, E.

GROUPS, (the) a cluster of islands lately discovered in the South Sea. They lie in about S. lat. 18, 12, and W. long. 142, 42. They are long narrow slips of land, ranging in all directions, some of them 10 miles or upwards in length, but not more than a quarter of a mile broad. They abound in trees; particularly those of the cocoa nut. They are inhabited by well-made people, of a brown complexion. Most of them carry in their hands a slender pole about 14 feet in length, pointed like a spear; they have likewise something shaped like a paddle, about four feet long. Their canoes are of different sizes, carrying from three to six or seven people, and some of them hoist a sail.

GRUBENHAGEN, (principality of,) so called as having formerly belonged to the Grubes family, a part of the dominions of the elector of Hanover, his present Britannic majesty. It lies in Brunswick and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It is 40 miles long, and the same in breadth, being intersected into two parts by the bishopric of Hildesheim, that on the E. side is bounded on the N. by the duchy of Wolfenbüttele; on the W. by Hildesheim, on the E. by the forest of Hartz; and on the S. by Eisfeld. The W. part is also bounded on the N. by Wolfenbüttele; on the S. by Oberwaldt, and both on the E. and W. by Hildesheim. The whole duchy is almost over-run with woods of fir or pine, the remains of the Hyrcinian forest; the soil is very barren, its treasure being hid under ground, especially in the eastern parts, where are most of the elector's mines of silver, copper, and lead, besides several sorts of minerals, being generally inhabited by miners.

GRUBENHAGEN, a town in the last mentioned principality of its name, with a castle, formerly the residence of the Grubes. It stands near the Leina, and upon a hill. All its inhabitants, and those in the neighbourhood are miners, the adjacent mountains being full of mines, and those covered with woods. It lies 39 miles S. of Hanover, and 64 S. W. of Brunswick. Lat. 51, 41, N. Long. 9, 41, E.

GRUFFENSEE, a small town and the capital of

of a bailiwick in the canton of Zurich, Switzerland. It stands almost at the extremity of a lake of its own name, very much abounding with fish, five miles long, and half that in breadth, about two German leagues and a half S. E. of Zurich. Here is a castle.

GRUNBERG, a town of Germany, in Silesia, and in the palatinate of Glogaw. Long. 20. 5, E. Lat. 52, 3, N.

GRUNDE, a town of Germany, in Lower Saxony, and in the duchy of Brunswick, seated among the mountains of Hartz. Long. 13, 35, E. Lat. 52, 10, N.

GRUNINGEN, a small town in the principality of Halberstadt, in Germany. Here is a large castle, formerly the residence of the bishops, where is a curious chapel, the inside gilt all over, with fine galleries, and a large gilt organ. Here is also a tun, in imitation of that at Heidelberg, but not so large, which will contain 1000 hog-heads nearly. It lies on the river Felke, 10 miles E. of Halberstadt.

GRUNINGEN, a small but pretty town of Zurich, one of the Swiss cantons, the capital of its bailiwick, is delightfully situated, and has a fine castle, the residence of the bailiff. In this territory a criminal for any offence is tried by all the heads of the families in the bailiwick. A religious house here has belonged to the Teutonic order ever since 1207. Both the church and its cloister, &c. were burnt down in 1706, by the blowing up of a magazine. It lies three German leagues and a half S. E. of Zurich.

GRUNSTADT, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine, seated in a fertile country. Long. 8, 15, E. Lat. 49, 31, N.

GRUYERES, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg, with a handsome castle, where the bailiff resides. It is famous for cheese, and is 15 miles S. W. of Friburg. Long. 7, 23, E. Lat. 46, 36, N.

GUACOCKINGO, a town of North America, in New Spain, 30 miles S. E. of Mexico. Long. 100, 25, W. Lat. 19, 40, N.

GUADALAQUIVER, a large river of Spain. It was formerly called Perca, and in still more ancient times it had the name of Bætis and Tarteßus. It takes its rise from several small streams in mount Segura, in the province of Andalusia, which uniting in one, form this river. It has a long course from Corduba to Seville, though very small: but from the last-mentioned city to its mouth, is navigable for large vessels; yet in it are several sand-banks. A few miles below Seville it forms a kind of small lake, at its issuing from which it divides itself into two branches, and at length falls into the bay of Cadiz.

G U

GUADALAVIAR, by the Romans called Durias, a river of Spain, the banks of which are delightfully covered with flowers and woods. It takes its rise on the confines of Arragón and New Castile; and after a S. E. course through the province of Valencia, falls into the sea below the city of the latter name.

GUADALAXARA, one of the three districts, governments, or courts of audience, into which Old Mexico, or New Spain, is divided: the other two are Mexico and Guatimala. This audience is also called the kingdom of New Galicia. It lies the farthest to the N. of the three audiences of New Spain, though situated on the coast of the South Sea. Its extent is between lat. 20 and 25. On the E. and S. it is bounded by Panuco, with several provinces of the audience of Mexico; on the N. by the kingdom of New Mexico; and on the W. it is washed by the South sea and the gulph of California, on the coast of which last it stretches above 200 leagues from S. E. to N. W. but within land it is very irregular, and the N. part especially is very narrow, yet in some places it is reckoned 500 miles broad.

Its climate differs much, according to its situation, being partly in the temperate, and partly in the torrid, zone; yet it is much more temperate than any other part of New Spain; and in general it is reckoned healthy: so that it is common for people to live here to 100 years of age: but it is much infested with gnats, bugs, and other vermin. The soil is mostly mountainous and woody; so that the coast looks like a desert. It is said, that the Spaniards have quite forsaken the coast on purpose, that, if strangers should land, they may not find any temptation to stay, because, besides the silver mines in this province, some of gold have been lately discovered, which are of very great value: and they choose to transport the ore on mules to Mexico, rather than run the risk of exposing so valuable a product to be intercepted by foreigners, if they ventured to send it in small vessels by sea. With regard to the rest, the country is pretty fruitful, and it produces European and Indian grain so plentifully, that the latter yields a hundred-fold, and the other two hundred: but it is often destroyed by locusts, and vast numbers of pies no larger than sparrows, as their olives are by ants. In this country are all sorts of fruits, herbs, and roots, better than those in Europe; plenty of sugar-canes, cochineal, and bees, said to be without stings. The pastures abound with all sorts of cattle, and the woods with venison, pine, and oak trees; yet they are infested by wolves and scorpions. Here is a medicinal pepper, which cures all sores; green-stones, also, said to be a specific against the gravel; fragrant flowers, flowers, valuable drugs, and rich mines of silver, copper, and lead. On the coast also is a good pearl-fishery. The natives are subtle, treacherous, and lazy; they are armed with bows and arrows, and often attack the Spaniards from the woods, except when the Spanish officers are in conjunction with their caciques in the government. The better sort of Spaniards live here by trade, and are masters of the silver-mines; the others following tillage and grazing.

Such of the natives as pretend to be civilized, are very indolent and lazy, and will not work but for great wages. Their apparel is a shirt, and square cloak of cotton, fastened with two buttons before: they have drawers and coverlids of the same, and lie upon flags and mats made of these: they wear green stones and shells about their necks, arms, and legs. Their chief recreation is dancing to the sound of a hollow stick. Horse-flesh, and maize-cakes, are their principal and most delicious dainties; and chocolate and magney wine their favourite liquors.

This audience of Guadalajara is subdivided into the following seven provinces, as they lie from S. to N. namely, Guadalajara Proper, Xalisco, Chiametlan, Zacateens, New Biscay, Culiacan, and Cinaloa; all which see.

GUADALAXARA PROPER, which is the principal province, and gives name to the whole audience, is bounded on the E. and S. by the province of Machoacan, on the N. by that of Xalisco, and a corner of it washed by the Pacific ocean on the W. Notwithstanding its situation under the torrid zone, it is healthy, temperate, and fruitful; producing not only good timber, but European and Indian wheat in great plenty, and all the fruits found in both countries; besides the vast treasures of silver commonly taken out of its mines. It is not above 50 leagues either in length or breadth.

GUADALAXARA, a city of Mexico, and capital of the last-mentioned province, bearing its name, or of New Galicia. It is the head of the audience, the seat of the royal courts of justice, and a bishop's see of a considerable revenue, which is a suffragan to Mexico. It is a large, populous, and neat city, standing very pleasantly on the banks of the river Baranja, or Esquitlan, which issues from the lake of Mechoacan, whence it goes with a rapid stream towards the N. W. and at four leagues from this city it has a very high fall, after which it hastens into the Pacific ocean, between Xalisco and Chiametlan. It is no where fordable, so that the Spaniards cross it in boats. The lake of Chapala, which is said to be 40 leagues in circuit, lies on the S. side of this city. In this city are several churches, besides its stately cathedral, and some convents for both sexes. It is reckoned to lie 262 miles W. of the city of Mexico, and stands in a plain which is not only watered by the above-mentioned river, but by several brooks and springs that make it productive of great store both of corn and grass. About five leagues from it is a mountain of a prodigious height, and so steep that no beasts of burden can climb it; and all the other mountains about it are craggy, and full of large pine and oak trees. It lies in lat. 20, 51; long. 108, 20.

GUADALOUPE, one of the largest of all the Caribbees, in that division of them called the Leeward Islands. It is situated in the Atlantic ocean. It was so called by the great Columbus, who first discovered it, from the resemblance of its mountains to those of that name in Old Spain: the Caribbeans called it Karukera, or Carriceura. As soon as Columbus landed here, he and his Spaniards were attacked by a shower of arrows, shot by the women on the island, who were soon, however, dispersed by his fire-arms: upon which his men plundered and burnt their houses or huts, where were found great quantities of honey, wax, iron, bows and arrows, cotton spun and unspun, cotton hammocks, and looms for weaving; together with pumpions, or a sort of pine-apples, mastic, aloes, sandal, ginger, frankincense, a sort of cinnamon-trees, and various fruits and herbs different from ours. The birds he saw here were large parrots, partridges, turtles, and nightingales; besides daws, herons, falcons, and kites. He found the houses here better and fuller of provisions than any he had seen in these islands. A voyage made to Guadaloupe by the Spaniards, in 1625, gives the following account. The naked barbarians of this, as well as the other islands, used to be very impatient for the arrival of the Spanish fleets once a year: they reckoned up their months by moons; and when they thought the time drawing near, prepared sugar-canes, plantanes, tortoisés, and other provisions, in order to barter with them for iron, knives, and haberdashery-ware. The Indians had round canoes like troughs, painted with the English, Dutch, and French arms, this being then a common port for all nations that sailed to America. The hair of the natives hung down to the middle of their backs, and their faces were slashed and pinked. They had thin plates dangling at their noses like hog-rings, and they fawned like children upon the Spaniards.

It is upwards of 60 miles long, and about the same breadth. This island is 25 miles N. W. of Marigalante; and it is reckoned to be 65 miles N. of Martinico. Till the year 1759 it was subject to the French, when commodore Moor and general

Barrington

Barrington entirely reduced it to the obedience of Great Britain. Guadeloupe is the largest and one of the finest islands which belong to the French in those parts; being near 60 leagues in circuit. It is divided into two parts by a channel not a league and a half long, and from 30 to eight yards broad, called the Salt river, navigable for barks of 50 tons burthen, which runs N. and S. and communicates with the sea on both sides, by a large bay at each end, of which that on the N. is called Grand Cul de Sac, and that on the S. Petit Cul de Sac. The E. part of the island is called Grande Terre, and is about 19 leagues from Antigua point on the N. W. to the point of Guadeloupe on the S. E. and about nine leagues and a half in the middle, where broadest, and about 50 leagues in circuit. The W. part, which is properly Guadeloupe, is subdivided by a ridge of mountains, into Cabes-terre on the W. and Basse-terre on the E. This is 13 leagues and a half from N. to S. and seven and a half where broadest, and 35 leagues in circuit. Both parts would be joined by an isthmus a league and a half in breadth, were it not cut through by the said canal. The cold on those rocks suffers nothing to grow but fern, and some useless trees covered with moss. Towards the S. point, at the summit of them, rises so high as to be lost out of sight, in the middle region of the air, a mountain called the Sulphur Mountain, which exales, out of an opening 100 feet wide, a thick and black smoke, mixed with sparks, which are visible in the night. Out of these mountains run a great many streams that carry fruitfulness into the plains which they water, and temper the burning air of the climate. The whole island is divided into 22 parishes, 14 in Guadeloupe, and eight in Grande Terre. Grande Terre is destitute of fresh water, and 25 leagues in compass: both islands together about 60. The Salt river is about 50 toises or 300 feet over at its mouth, towards the Great Cul de Sac, from whence it grows narrower; so that in some places it is not above 90 feet over. Its depth is likewise as unequal as its breadth; for in some places it will carry a ship of 500 tons, and in others hardly bear a vessel of 50. It is a smooth, clear stream, from the one Cul de Sac to the other, and finely shaded, for the most part, with mangroves.

The air is very clear and healthy, and not so hot as in Martinico. Here is also plenty of water, and as good as the soil is rich, which last is not inferior to that of Martinico. It is as well cultivated, and fortified with equal strength. Its produce is the same with that of Martinico, and its export of sugar is as great, besides indigo, cotton, and those other commodities produced in all the islands of that part of America called the West Indies.

The chief product of the soil is cassia, tobacco, cassia, bannanas, pine-apples, store of rice, maize, and potatoes. Some of the mountains are overgrown with trees; and at the foot of others are large plains, watered by fresh and sweet streams. Here are several boiling hot springs, particularly one to the W. side, near the island of Goyaves. The two gulphs, called the Culs de Sac, abound with tortoises, sharks, pilots, and the other fish common to those seas: and here is abundance of those called land-crabs, with swarms of musquitos and gnats.

The forts of this island are, 1. Fort Lewis, in the Grande Terre, on the E. side of the bay, called Petit Cul de Sac. It is too high to defend the vessels that anchor at the bottom of it; and therefore they have erected a redoubt below it, with a battery of six guns, which play into the road. From this fort may be seen not only the greatest part of the Cabes-terre, and Grand Cul de Sac, and many small islands in the Petit Cul, with the islands of Xaintes, but also the mountains of Dominica in clear weather. This fort lies in the parish of Gofier, on the Grande Terre. Certain abysses are in the Grande Terre, which are great indentures made in the land by the sea, affording shelter for vessels, in very deep water, from the hurricanes or an enemy, and where they are moored to palmetto-trees on each side.

2. The Great Cul de Sac contains a basin five or six leagues in length, from the point of Grosse Morne, in the Basse Terre, to that of Antigua, in the Grande Terre. It is also nearly three leagues in the broadest part, and at least one in the narrowest; with safe riding for ships of all rates.

3. The Petit Cul de Sac is a populous, well cultivated, and trading parish, to the N. of that of Goyaves; and both are in the Cabes-terre, on the E. side of Guadeloupe Proper. Here are no less than eight rivers, besides near as many brooks that run into the sea in the space of four leagues, betwixt the river of Coin, which is to the W. of the Salt river, and the Brick-kiln river.

Ginger comes up extremely well in the E. part of Guadeloupe Proper, betwixt the Great Cul de Sac and the river of Cabes-terre; and though the climate of these islands is very hot, the people eat a vast quantity of it, even when green. The Cabes-terre river, called the Great river, is in some places 180 feet wide. Its water is very clear, but almost impassable by reason of numerous rocks.

The next river to the S. is the Grand Cabet, and a little farther is the Grand Bananiers, that terminates the quarter called Cabes-terre, which is by much the finest part of the island. For from this river to the Grosse Morne, where begins the Grand Cul, it is a very even country, near 20 leagues in extent by the sea-side, which is only a league league in some places, and at most but four from the mountains.

The quarters of the Trois Rivières on the S. E. side is four miles broad, with a good soil for sugar-canes, and several considerable settlements. They have here at the S. end, what they call the Old Fort, for the security of the coast, which is very even, has good anchorage, and smooth water; where should an enemy make a descent, and possess themselves of this part, they might cut off the communication betwixt the Cabes-terre and Basse-terre, and so make themselves masters of the whole. In the sulphur mountains is a redoubt, called Dos d'Asne, to which, upon a descent, they send their best effects, wives, children, &c. But the country here is so full of woods and precipices, that a handful of men might keep off an army.

The river of the Galleons on the S. W. side, where is another fort, is a considerable river; and when fordable, the only passage from the Cabes-terre to the Basse-terre. Here is excellent anchorage, but the water tastes of sulphur and vitriol, causing fluxes.

The chief fort of the whole island is that at the town of Basse-terre, two leagues N. from the point of the old fort; which at the first peopling, consisted of two considerable towns, one close by the river St. Louis, or the Rivière de Peres, i. e. the Jacobite Friars' river; the other on both sides of the Bailiff river, where was at first a chapel, now turned to a parochial church. But the former having been carried away twice by the inundations of the river in hurricanes, the inhabitants removed towards the fort, where they built the town of St. Louis, which is now the principal town of the island, having several churches, monasteries, &c. and a castle with four bulwarks, besides a fort on a neighbouring mountain: yet it has been ruined more than once. In 1691 it was burned by the English, together with some other forts; and when entirely rebuilt, it was carried away by an inundation of the river Bailiff. It was begun to be rebuilt, when the English burnt it again in 1703, together with Magdalen and other forts. A considerable addition is planned to be added to it, called Le Bourg, which will make it the handsomest of any in the colony. This fort stands upon higher ground than the town; its walls are washed on the S. E. by the river Galleons; on the S. W. it faces the sea, being only 100 paces from it; and on the N. W. side it looks towards the town and the mountains. The most considerable part of the town is between the fort and the river of Herbs; and this is properly the town of Basse-terre; and that which extends from the river to the brook of Billan, is called the town of St. Francis, from a church and convent of Capuchins in it. In May 1759, by the unanimity between commodore Moore and general Barrington, together with the great valour of the British troops, this island came gradually, and in a very short time, into our hands; as did that of Marigalante soon after; but by the peace in 1763 it was returned to the French.

Betwixt the river Bailiff on the W. and the great river of Goyaves, or St. Charles, on the E. are the ruins of another fortification destroyed by the English in 1691. All the ground between the Bailiff river and that of Plessis is called the Marsh of St. Robert.

The top of the Sulphur mountain, to which you must pass over the river St. Louis, is bare, without any thing but fern, and some sorry shrubs full of moss. From hence may plainly be seen not only Dominica, the Xaintes islands, and Marigalante, but a clear view of Martinico one way, as well as Monserrat, Nevis, and the neighbouring islands the other. Round the hill are burnt stones and whitish ashes, which smell strong of sulphur. These increase the higher you ascend; and at the top, which is a vast rugged platform, covered with all sizes of burnt stones, smoke issues out from sundry clefts and chinks. On the E. side of the mountain are two mouths of this sulphur pit, one of which was oval, and judged to be about 100 feet in its greatest diameter, every now and then emitting thick clouds of smoke, and sparks of fire. The negroes who sell brimstone fetch it from this mountain. About 200 paces below the least and lowest mouth are three little pools of very hot water, four or five paces asunder, the biggest of which may be about six feet in diameter. Its water is very dark-coloured, and smells like that in a smith's forge. The second is whitish, and has the taste of allum. The third is blue, and of a vitriolic taste. Here are also several small springs, which, uniting, form divers rivers of torrents; one of them, called the White river, from the ashes and sulphur covering it, falls into that of St. Louis. The middle and bottom of this burning mountain are as different from the top as if in quite another country, being covered with a delightful verdure of tall trees and herbage, watered with abundance of rivulets, and very carefully cultivated.

The French, when they settled here in 1635, began by attacking the Caribbs, who possessed the island. This war was followed, during three years, by a horrible famine that almost destroyed the infant colony; the inhabitants were reduced to eat grass, and to dig up the dead corps to live on.

After

After the famine succeeded incursions of enemies, disputes among the chiefs and planters, and some other sad disasters, which almost brought this colony to ruin, and prevented it from making any progress, so that at the end of 60 years the mother-country hardly perceived the existence of the colony. The success and prosperity of the island cannot be dated before the peace of Utrecht. At the end of 1755, Guadaloupe contained 9624 whites, and 41,000 slaves. The amount of its saleable goods was produced by 334 sugar-plantations, 15 square fields of indigo, 46,840 cacao-trees, 11,700 tobacco-plants, 2,257,725 of coffee, and 12,748,447 of cotton. For its provisions they cultivated 29 squares of rice, or maize, and 1219 of potatoes and yams, 2,028,520 bananas, and 32,577,950 holes of manioc or cassia. The cattle consisted of 4946 horses, 2924 mules, 125 asses, 13,716 horned beasts, 11,162 sheep and goats, and 2455 swine. The principal article is cassia or manioc, of which they make bread, and of this plant there is more cultivated here than in all the English islands taken together. In 1763 it was rendered independent of Martinico, and had a governor of its own appointed, and has Desirade island and Marigalante annexed to it, as well as Xaintes. In 1767, Guadaloupe contained 11,863 white inhabitants, 752 free blacks or mulattoes, 72,761 slaves, in all, 85,376 persons. Its cattle consisted 5060 horses, 4854 mules, 211 asses, 17,378 horned beasts, 14,895 sheep and goats, and 2669 swine. For provisions it had 30,476,218 holes of manioc, 2,819,262 bananas, 2118 squares of land with yams and potatoes. Amongst its plantations were 72 anattas, 327 cassia trees, 135,294 cocoa trees, 5,881,176 coffee trees, 12,156,769 plants of cotton, 21,474 squares of land with sugar canes. The woods take up 22,097 squares of land; there are 20,247 of pasture or savannas, and 6405 uncultivated or abandoned, 1582 plantations of cotton, coffee, cocoa, and provisions; 401 of sugar-canes, which employ 140 water-mills, 263 moved by oxen, and 11 by wind.

Its productions, with those of its dependencies, amount annually to 46,000,000 of pounds of sugar, 21,000,000 of coffee, 320,000 of cotton, and 8000 cocoa.

GUADALOUPE, commonly GUARDALOUPE, a small, but well-built, town of Spanish Estremadura. It stands in a very fruitful valley, upon the banks of the river of the same name.

GUADARAMA, a town of New Castile, in Spain. It lies 26 miles N. W. of Madrid. Lat. 40. 51. N. Long. 4. 39. W.

Of the same name is also a river in this province; which rising in the mountains of Toledo, after a course from N. to S. falls into the Tagus below the city of that name.

GUADEL, a town of Asia, in Persia, and in the province of Mekran, with a pretty good harbour. Long. 62, 55. E. Lat. 25. 0. N.

GAUDEN, an inland district of Tessel, or the Further Sus, in Africa. It lies N. W. of that of Tessel Proper, and is small. It resembles a large continued village in the midst of a desert. The inhabitants are very poor and brutish; and, except dates, they have hardly any thing to live upon or traffic with. They go almost naked. They kill some ostriches and other wild fowl, and they breed only a few goats for the sake of their milk. To enhance their misery, they are in subjection to the tyrannical Ludaias.

GUADENBURG, a small city in the principality of Halberstadt, in Germany, near the confines of that principality. In 1698 the elector of Brandenburg purchased it for a valuable consideration of the elector of Saxony.

GUADIANA, a river of Spain, which rises in the middle of New Castile. It runs S. W. by Calatrava and Ciudad Real, passes on to Merida in Spanish Estremadura, and by Bajadoz enters Portugal near Elvas; after which it runs through Alentejo and Algarve, and then discharges itself into the Mediterranean near Ayamonte and Castro.

GUADILBARBAR, a river of Africa, has its source in mount Atlas, when, after running from S. to N. through the kingdom of Tunis, it falls into the Mediterranean near Bona.

GUADIX, anciently the capital of the Accitani; and among the Romans known by the name of Acci, Colonia Julia, Gemella, or Accitana. Its present name was given it by the Moors, on account of some salubrious waters in or near it, the word signifying in Arabic the water of life. This is a pretty large town, the see of a bishop, and lies 49 miles E. of Granada city. Lat. 37. 21. N. Long. 3. 22. W.

GUAGIDA, an ancient city of Anga, in Africa, built by the natives in a fertile plain, inclosed with good walls, and surrounded with orchards, gardens, &c. being well watered by a large spring running through it, which falls into the Maluya. It has often been plundered and depopulated. It has now about two or 3000 Bereberes dwelling in it, continually infested and harassed with Turks and Arabs.

At this place are the finest mules in all Africa, which are sent to Tremecen, and from thence sold into all parts of Asia and Europe. It lies about 30 miles from the sea.

GUALATA, a kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, bounded on the N. by Derveches, on the S. by land, bounded on the N. by Derveches, on the S. by the river Senegal, on the E. by a chain of mountains, and on the W. by the river of St. Anthony, and by the Ludages. The inhabitants are negroes, and are said to receive strangers with great hospitality; and the country seems to be the same now known by the name of the Grand Jollois. They have much the same inclinations as the people that live in the deserts, and are fond of mares-milk and horse-flesh. What religion they have is Mahometanism.

GUALDA, a small town of the Ecclesiastical State, and marquisate of Ancona, in the Middle Division of Italy. In 1751 it was almost entirely demolished by an earthquake.

GUALEOR, (province of,) in the midland parts of Indostan, or the Hither India, in Asia. It is bounded on the N. by Agra, on the S. by part of Bengal and Malway, on the S. E. by Narvar, and on the W. by Bando and part of Ranas. The Sansons make it nearly 270 miles from E. to W. and about 180 its greatest breadth.

GUALEOR, the capital of the last-mentioned province of its name, a large city on the E. side of a craggy mountain, the top of which is surrounded with walls and towers, also ponds of rain water, and ground to sow sufficient for the subsistence of the garrison, both within the inclosure. Here the mogul has a palace, on the descent of the hill towards the N. E. and not only keeps an immense treasure and garrison to guard it, but imprisons princes and nobles in the fortress; where Aureng-Zebe confined his two elder sons, &c. and had them poisoned soon after.

Below the palace are several idols cut out of the rock. Here, in a mesque, is a stately monument, with a piazza for a market before it, and surrounded with vault and shops, which was erected for Aureng-Zebe's youngest brother. It lies 46 miles S. of Agra. Lat. 26, 10, N. Long. 79, 20, E.

GUAM, or GUANA, one of the Ladrone islands, in the Pacific ocean, and the principal of them. The soil is fruitful. They have cocobas, bananas, large figs, sugar-cane, fowl, fish, all kinds of fruit, &c. and a species of apple called bread-fruit; also excellent pork fed with cocoa-nuts.

The Acapulco ship touches here, both outward and homeward bound; as do those belonging to other nations in their voyage from America to Asia, for provisions, &c. Here the Spaniards have a fort. See LADRONES.

GUAMANGA, the capital of a diocese of the same name, in the audience of Lima and Peru, in South America. By the Spaniards was added San Jun de la Victoria, in memory of the precipitate retreat of Ynca Manco from Pizarro, who offered him battle. It stands on the declivities of some mountains, not remarkably high, which extending southward, inclose a spacious plain E. of the town, watered by a small stream. The inhabitants are obliged to have small fountains. Here are 20 noble families in the middle of the town, who live in spacious and high houses, partly of stone, and covered with tiles. They have extensive gardens and orchards, but scarce of water. The Indian suburbs are large, and the houses, though low, are principally of stone, and roofed. The cathedral is very splendid; and here is a royal university, with professors of philosophy, divinity, and law.

In Guamanga are three other churches, besides several chapels, five convents, a handsome college and an hospital; with nunneries of St. Clair and Carmelites, and a religious sisterhood. It lies 208 miles E. of Lima. Lat. 12, 20, N. Long. 72, 36, W.

Guamanga, was founded for the convenience of carrying on trade between the ancient and modern capital of Peru, being about half way between Cusco and Lima.

GUAMANGA, (jurisdiction of,) to which the last-mentioned city belongs, enjoys so good a temperature, that it abounds in variety of grain, fruit, and cattle, and besides is very populous. One part of its trade consists in bend-leather for shoe soles, which are cut out here. Conserves and sweetmeats are likewise made here in great quantities. The jurisdictions in Guamanga diocese are the following nine: Guamanga Proper, Guanta, Vilcas-Guaman, Andogwaylas, Guanica-Belcia, Angaraes, Castio Vineyna, Parima-cocha, and Lucanas.

GUAMALIES, one of the jurisdictions in the archbishopric of Lima, in Peru, in South America. It lies in the middle of the Cordillera, consequently its air is very different. Its situation being rather cold than temperate, few places are fertile in its whole extent, which is above 40 leagues, and begins 80 leagues N. E. of Lima. The Indian inhabitants of the towns weave a great variety of baize, serges, and other stuffs, in which they carry on a very considerable trade with the other provinces destitute of such manufactures.

GUAMAN-VILCAS, a jurisdiction of Lima, in South America, S. E. of Guamanga, and six or seven leagues distant from it, extending above 30. It is a temperate and fruitful climate, has very fine pastures, in which are bred vast numbers of cattle. The Indians of the towns weave baize, &c. which are carried to Cusco, &c. But the great distance of the places renders this trade very laborious.

GUANCA,

G U

GUANCA-BELICA, one of the provinces of Lima, in South America, begins 30 leagues N. of Guamanga. The town of the same name was founded on account of the rich quicksilver mines, from which all the silver mines of Peru are supplied with that mineral, and yet no diminution of it perceivable. The coldness of the air checks here the growth of all grain and fruits. This town is noted for a water which forms such large petrifications, that the inhabitants use them in building, &c.

These mines were discovered in 1564, and are situated 60 leagues from Lima. In its profound abyss are seen streets, squares, and a chapel, and an immense number of flambeaux are continually kept burning to enlighten it. The earth which contains the quicksilver is of a whitish red, like burnt brick. This is pounded and put into an earthen kiln, the upper part of which is a vault like an oven, somewhat of a spherical form, extended on an iron grate covered with earth, under which a gentle heat is kept up with the herb icho, which is fitter for this purpose than any other combustible matter, and the cutting of which, on that account, is prohibited for 20 leagues round the mine. The heat which penetrates this earth makes the pounded mineral so hot, that the quicksilver issues out of it volatilized in smoke. But as the upper part of the kiln is closely stopped, the smoke finds no vent but by a small hole, which has a communication with a series of little round earthen vessels, or retorts, the necks of which are indented into each other. There the smoke circulates and condenses by means of a little water at the bottom of each vessel, into which the quicksilver falls in a pure heavy liquid. Private people work this mine at their own expence, and of course might be expected to reap the profits arising from it, on paying a certain duty; but the case is otherwise. They are obliged to deliver to the Spanish government, at a stated price, all the mercury they extract; and as soon as they have procured the quantity which the demands of one year require, the work is suspended.

GUANIHANI, now CAT-ISLAND, one of the Bahamas, in the Atlantic ocean, near the coast of North America. This was the first land which Columbus discovered, on October 11, 1492, and hence called it St. Salvador, his crew having given themselves over for lost, in an immense ocean, till they spied this island. It lies in lat. 24, 10, N. Long. 76, 21, W.

GUANTA, one of the jurisdictions of Lima, in Peru, in South America. It lies N. N. W. of Guamanga, beginning a little above four leagues from the city of the latter name, and is about 30 leagues long. It is of a good temperature of air and fertility. Its silver mines, formerly very rich, are now greatly exhausted. The herb caca, and lead produced in this country, are the main branches of its commerce. It also supplies Guamanga city with great part of its corn and fruit.

GUANUCO, the capital city of its jurisdiction of the same name, in Peru, in South America. It begins 40 leagues N. E. of Lima. It was formerly one of the principal in these kingdoms, and the seat of the first conquerors, but is now in a ruinous condition; so that it can hardly be compared with an Indian town. Its temperature is very pure and mild, and the soil fruitful. Here are made several sorts of sweet-meats and jellies, sold into the other provinces. This town lies 192 miles N. E. of Lima. Lat. 10, 21, S. Long. 75, 20, W.

GUANZAVELCA, a town of South America, in Peru, and in the audience of Lima. It is rich, and abounds in mines of quicksilver. It is 159 miles from Pisco. Long. 71, 59, W. Lat. 12, 40, S.

GUARA, a town of Lima, in Peru, in South America, consisting only of one street, a quarter of a league long, with about 200 houses. Here is a parish and Franciscan convent, the whole valley being extremely delightful, eastward covered with sugar-canes, westward divided into fields of corn, maize, &c. At the S. end of the town is a large tower with a gate, over which is a kind of redoubt, and just opposite is a stone bridge, under which runs Guara river, washing the rock on which the houses stand, but without any damage. For this river is a suburb, extending above half a league, but the houses discontiguous, being intermixed with pleasant groves and gardens. By a solar observation, it is found to lie in lat. 11, 3, S. The sky is clear, and the temperature regular. The colds and heats are easily supportable.

GUARACHIA, a jurisdiction of Lima, in Peru, in South America. It contains the first chain, and part of the second, of the mountains, extending along these above 40 leagues, and begins about six leagues E. of Lima. The places only which lie in the vallies and breaches of the mountains are inhabited, and these are very fertile in fruit, wheat, barley, maize, &c. In its mountains are silver mines, though few of them are worked, being none of the richest.

GUARDA, a city of Beira, in Portugal, and the see of a bishop. It has its name from its strong situation: it is a fence against Leon. It stands on a rock very craggy, has a strong castle above it, and is surrounded with a wall, having six gates and several towers. It contains 2300 inhabitants, lies not far from the source of the river Mondego, upon part of mount Estrella. The houses houses are very good, though antique. Here are five parishes, a monastery, nunnery, &c. The cathedral is a stately structure. It lies 71 miles E. of Coimbra. Lat. 40, 36, N. Long. 7, 21, W.

GUARDA FEU, (cape of,) the most easterly promontory of Africa, upon the coast of Anian, near the entrance into the Red sea. Lat. 11, 10, N. Long. 50, 12, E.

GUARDA MAR, a small town of Valencia, in Spain, having a good harbour near the mouth of the river Segura, from which they export salt.

GUARDALOUPE. See GUADALOUPE.

GUARDIA, a small town of Galicia, in Spain, in the form of a half moon, with a harbour of the like construction at the mouth of the Minho. It is defended by a strong castle, standing on a rock.

GUARDIA, with the addition of Alferes, a small Episcopal city of the county of Molise, a territory of the kingdom of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy. Its bishop is a suffragan to Benevento, and is but thinly inhabited, by reason of the badness of its air. It lies on the river Tiferno, and confines of the Capitanate, about five miles N. E. of Larina, and 16 N. W. of Molese. Lat. 41, 54, N. Long. 15, 33, E.

GUARGALA, or GUERGUELA, a district in the province of Zeb, in Africa, lying eastward of Tocort, and capital of a small kingdom of the same name, in Biledulgerid, to the S. of mount Atlas, 420 miles S. by E. of Algiers. Long. 9, 55, E. Lat. 28, 0, N.

GUARICO, a town situated on the N. side of St. Domingo, one of the Antilles islands, in the Atlantic ocean. It is also called Cape François, and lies in lat. 19, 55. It is near half a league in length, and contains about 14 or 1500 inhabitants, being a mixture of Creols, Europeans, Negroes, Mulattos, and Casts. Here is a church, a good square, a college lately belonging to the Jesuits, a nunnery, an hospital, and a convent of religious. The town lies open, without any other defence than a single rampart: but it is well garrisoned within.

The place is extremely well cultivated, being sown with every species of grain. The servile work is all done by negroes, and the people here are rich enough to send large returns to France for the European commodities brought hither. The grounds here are laid out in plantations of sugar, indigo, tobacco, and coffee, the joint produce of which is so large, that 30,000 tons are annually exported to France. It is in these respects a very considerable colony to France, no less than 160 sail, small and great, coming annually from France, from 150 to 500 tons, to Guarico. All these ships come loaded with goods and provisions; and every one returns with 30 or 40,000 dollars in specie. Those only which go from Guarico, exclusive of the cargo, which consists of the products of the colony, carry to France every year half a million of dollars. Not one fourth part of the cargo of so many ships can be consumed in this colony and its dependencies; and consequently it must find a great account in its trade with the Spanish settlements, as the Havannah, Catraccas, Santa Martha, Carthagena, Terra Firma, Nicaragua, and Honduras.

GUARMEY, a small town of Lima and Peru, in S. America, consists only of 40 houses, inhabited by about 70 families, few of which are Spaniards. It is the residence of the corregidor, has a good harbour, and lies 16 leagues from Manchán, and 134 miles N. W. of Lima. Lat. 10, 3, S. Long. 78, 12, W.

GUARUS, GYARA, or GYARE, one of the Cyclades islands, near Delos, and according to Pliny is 12 miles in compass. It is the most abandoned and disagreeable place of the Archipelago. In Strabo's time it had but one small village, and that inhabited by a few beggarly fishermen, who after the battle of Actium, sent a deputation to Augustus, to obtain a diminution of their annual tribute, which was set at 150 denarii. We are told by ancient writers that it was once infested by swarms of field-mice of extraordinary size, which, after having driven out the inhabitants, were forced to live upon the iron that was dug out of the mines, finding nothing else to subsist on in so barren a place. It was not therefore without reason, that the Romans used to banish offenders to this island; for they had not in their wide spreading dominions a more wretched and uncomfortable place to send them to.

GUASCO, a sea-port in the bishopric of Imperial and Chili, in S. America. Within the port is a small round island; and near this, at the bottom of the bay, is a river, opposite to the mouth of which is the anchoring-place. In this port vessels are secure from S. and S. W. winds; the land is pretty level, and at the top of the port is a plain of sand; off the S. W. point of the port, are seven or eight rocks, about which are many shoals. It lies 95 (Dampier makes it but 30) miles N. of La Serena.

GUASH, WASH, or WADELAND, a river in Rutlandshire, which runs into the Welland above Stamford.

GUASTACA, or PANUCO, a province which borders on New Leon and Mexico, in which province they gather cochineal and several grains, and it abounds with very rich silver mines. All the shores shores are low, overflowed, unhealthy, and full of salt marshes; in other respects it is like Tlascala.

GUASTALLA, also VASTALLA and GUARDISTALLIUM, the capital of a duchy of its name, in the Mantuan and Upper Division of Italy. Its capital of the same name stands on the Crostobolo near the river Po, upon the confines of the duchy of Modena, in the mid-way between Mantua on the N. of it, and Reggio on the S. A council was holden here under pope Paschal II. in the year 1106. Near this place likewise the duke of Orleans lay encamped, with the river Crostobolo in front, when prince Eugene marched through the Modenese to relieve Turin: a battle was also fought in its neighbourhood, between the Spaniards and Imperialists in 1734, in which the latter were worsted. It hath a small territory round it, which with the city, constitutes the whole duchy; and having been in the possession of the house of Austria, since the last duke of Mantua was put to the ban of the empire, it was ceded to Don Philip Duke of Parma, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748. It lies 20 miles S. of Mantua, Lat. 45, 12, N. Long. 11, 15, E.

GUATIMALA, (audience and province of,) in New Spain, is above 750 miles in length, and 450 in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by Chiapa and Verapaz; on the S. and W. by the South Sea, and on the E. by Honduras. It extends its jurisdiction over 300 leagues, to the S. 100 to the N. 60 to the E. and 12 towards the S. Sea. There is no country in this part of the world where nature has lavished her gifts with greater profusion. The air is every where wholesome, and the climate temperate; poultry and game are found here in the greatest abundance, and of an excellent flavour. No territory in the world produces better corn. The rivers, lakes, and sea, every where abound with excellent fish. The cattle have multiplied to such a degree, that it is become necessary to kill all that run wild on the mountains, to prevent their prejudicing agriculture, by their excessive numbers. This audience is one of the largest in New Spain, and was conquered in the years, 1524, and 1525, by Pedro de Alvarado.

It has 12 provinces under it, and the native Americans under the dominions of Spain, profess christianity; but it is mixed with a great many of their own superstitions. There is a great chain of high mountains, which run across it from E. to W. and it is subject to earthquakes and storms. It is, however, very fertile, and produces great quantities of chocolate, cochineal, cotton and indigo. The merchandise of this province are generally conveyed to the port of St. Thomas, in the bay of Honduras, to be sent to Europe. The way across this province to the South Sea, is about 65 leagues, and is the next to that from Vera Cruz to Acapulco.

St. Jago de Guatemala was the capital of the whole audience, but it was swallowed up by an earthquake in October, 1773. It contained about 60,000 inhabitants of all colours, and was immensely rich, but there are no traces of it left. The loss was estimated at 15 millions sterling, in merchandise, and it was the third city of the Spanish empire in America.

GUATIMALA, (the volcano of,) is a mountain which throws out fire and smoke. St. Jago de Guatemala was almost ruined by it in 1541. It was rebuilt at a good distance from this dreadful mountain, which totally demolished it in April, 1773. See ST. JAGO.

GUATULCO, or ACATAPCO, a town of Guaxaca, and audience of Mexico, in New Spain, in South America. It stands on the W. side of a river, where it falls into the South Sea. Drake and Cavendish formerly took and plundered it. The harbour is said to be one of the best in Mexico, being three miles long and one broad, but the safest riding is on the W. side, from 6 to 16 fathoms. The mark for finding this port, is a great hollow rock on the shore, with a hole at top, through which the water being forced, makes a hideous noise, like the blowing of a whale. The land here rises gradually in short ridges parallel to the shore, and is covered with tall trees. It lies about 100 miles S. S. W. from Antequera.

GUAVES PETIT, in St. Domingo. See HISPANIOLA.

GUAXACA, a province belonging to the audience of Mexico, or New Spain. It reaches from the bay of Mexico on the N. to the South Sea, on the S. having the province of Tlascala on the N. W. and those of Chiapa, Guatemala, and Tabasco on the E. It extends nearly 95 leagues along the South Sea, 50 along the bay of Mexico, and near 120 on the confines of Tlascala, but not above 50 along those of Chiapa. The air here is good, and the soil fruitful, especially in mulberry-trees, so that it produces more silk than any province in America. Except the valley of Guaxa, the greatest part is mountainous, yet abounding with wheat, cattle, sugar, cotton, honey, cocoa, plantains, and other fruits. It has rich mines of gold, silver, and lead, and all its rivers have gold in their sands. Cassia, cochineal, crystal, and copperas, abound also here. Were the people of this province industrious, they might be richest in the West-Indies; but they are accustomed-accustomed to a lazy life by the clergy, who have 120 monasteries, besides several hospitals, schools, and other places of publick charity; insomuch that the Indians purchase provisions principally by the gold which the women pick up in the rivers. This province was formerly reckoned to contain 150 considerable towns, besides upwards of 300 villages; but now it is said to be thinly inhabited. Great part of the estates belonging to the Cortez family lie in this country. The least difficult pass from one sea to another is, through this province, by the river Guazahualcos, to the port De la Ventosa, in the gulph Tequantepec. The mountain of Co-cola, which separates this province from Tlascala, has mines of gold, silver, crystal, vitriol, and different sorts of precious stones.

The vanilla, a drug used as a perfume to give chocolate a flavour, is the produce of Guaxaca. It grows, indeed, in divers parts of Mexico, but no where so plentifully, as in this province.

GUAXACA, the capital of the last-mentioned province bearing its name, in New Spain. It is the see of a bishop, and the residence of a governor. It lies 120 miles W. of Spirito Santo, and 230 S. of the city of Mexico, and 132 in the same direction from the gulph of this last name, and S. of Vera Cruz, in the delightful valley of Guaxaca, which is 18 miles in length, and 12 in breadth, and in the road leading from Chiapa to Guatimala. Here is a very stately cathedral, and it contains several thousand families, both Spaniards and Indians. Of the former are several which are rich, and descended from the old Spanish governors. This, though a middling city, and but indifferently built, carries on a considerable trade both with the North and South Seas. The river here is not fortified, so that small vessels might easily sail up and subdue the country. The best chocolate in America is made here by the nuns, and exported from hence to Spain. In this valley, which Charles V. of Spain gave Cortez, with the title of Marquis del Velle, are several rich towns, cloisters, and churches; with an excellent breed of horses, and great herds of black cattle and sheep, which furnish the clothiers of Los Angeles with wool, and Spain with hides. The Creolian clergy here are as great enemies to the Spanish clergy as the native Americans are. According to some, the proper name of Guaxaca is Antiquera; but this last others make a separate town, and bishop's see also, situated about 80 miles to the S. W. It is said to have a stately cathedral, adorned with many large and high pillars of marble, each of which is as one entire stone. It is situated in lat. 18. 2. Long. 101. 20.

GUAYAQUIL, the capital of its own province in S. America. Its first site was in the bay of Charapota, a little N. of that of the village Monte Christo, but was entirely destroyed by the Indians; upon which it was removed to the present spot on the W. bank of the river of its own name, on the declivity of Mount Cerillo Verde, and is now called Ciudad Vieja, or the Old town. The principal part of the city was built in 1665, at the distance of 5 or 600 toises, and a timber bridge of communication with the old part, erected over the hollows made by the floods. It is a city of considerable extent, taking up along the river near half a league; but the breadth is not proportional, every person being fond of having a house near the river for the benefit of refreshing winds. All the houses are of timber, some being thatched, but most of them tiled; the former covering being prohibited, to prevent fires. They are generally large and beautiful, consisting of only one story and a ground-floor, with spacious porticos before them. In winter the new city is one continued slough, being a spongy chalk, and level; whereas the old town is built on a gravelly soil, never impassable.

The city has two forts on the river near it, and a third behind it, guarding the entrance of a hollow or ravine; besides a platform in the old town. These are built of a very hard wood, forming a variety palisadoes. Before the erection of these fortifications, European Corsairs took the place in 1686 and 1709, the latter capture was effected through the villany of a Mulatto, who lead the enemy through a by-way. The churches and convents are all of wood, except St. Domingo in the old town, which is of stone.

In the new city, besides the parish-church, are an Augustine and Franciscan convent, with a college and hospital. The inhabitants are generally computed at 20,000, the number being very much increased by the continual resort of strangers hither for commerce. Notwithstanding the heat of the climate here, its natives are not tawny; and all of them, except those born from a mixture of blood, are fresh coloured, and very finely featured, the children even of Spaniards from Spanish women being very fair, with light hair and eye-brows. Besides these natural advantages, the inhabitants are elegant and polite, but not famous for their riches, partly owing to the two pillages above-mentioned, and partly to fires. The dress of their women is extremely splendid and becoming. The expence of a house of figure (the whole charge of which is the cutting the wood and bringing it to the city) amounts to 15 or 20,000 dollars, workmen's wages being very high, and iron remarkably dear. The winter sets in here about December, and generally lasts till April or May, during which season, the elements, insects, and vermin, seem to have joined in a league to incommode the human species. Its heat is extreme, and in the middle of winter greater than at Carthagena. The rains continue day and night, with dreadful thunder and lightning, the rivers overflowing their banks, and laying the whole country under water; snakes, poisonous vipers, scorpions, and scorpenderas get into their houses, and even beds. Besides the infinite variety of volatile insects, almost insupportable, the houses swarm with rats, very little afraid of the human species: all which inconveniences little affect the natives. The least troublesome season here is the summer, when both the number and activity of these vermin are diminished, the heat being abated by the setting in of the S. W. and W. S. W. breezes, called Chaudui, as coming over a mountain of that name. They begin constantly at noon, and continue till five or six next morning. The sky is always serene: provisions are in great plenty; fruits are also very common, especially melons. The capital advantage is, the salubrity of the air in that season. During winter tertian fevers are frequent. Since 1740 the black vomit has made its appearance, the galleons of the South sea having brought this distemper to Guayaquil. The natives are very subject to catarrhs and other distempers of the eye. They have several sorts of bread made from grains and roots; the most usual is the criollo or antipe plantains, cut into slices and roasted. Most of the other provisions, except beef, fruits, and roots, are imported from the provinces of the Cordillera and Peru. Near the city the fish in the river are scarce, and those far from good; but some leagues above the city most excellent. The coasts and neighbouring ports abound in very delicious fish, with several of the testaceous kind, which constitute a considerable part of the inhabitants food: besides large fine lobsters, and great quantities of oysters.

In summer good water is very scarce at Guayaquil, there being none at a less distance than four or five leagues up the river. Instead of lard in dressing their food, they use beef suet, the smell and taste of which is extremely nauseous, and all is highly seasoned with Guinea pepper. The inhabitants affect great splendor in their formal entertainments, serving up an alternate succession of sweet-meats and high-seasoned dishes. Their common drink on these occasions is grape brandy, cordials, and wine; of all which they drink freely. Punch has of late greatly obtained among persons of distinction, who take a glass at 11 o'clock, and again in the evening. And even the ladies punctually observe this custom.

GUAYAQUIL, (river of,) being the channel of the commerce of the city of its name, an account of it will give a more adequate idea of that article. Its navigable part from the city to the custom house at Babahoyo, where goods are landed, being against the current of the river, is divided into 26 reaches, its course being serpentine; but to Caracol, the landing-place in winter, 24 reaches, the three nearest the city being about two leagues and a half in length, but the others not one; so that between Guayaquil and the custom-house is 24 leagues and a half, and to Caracol 28 and a half. From Guayaquil to Isla Verde, at the mouth of the river in Puna bay, is six leagues; and from Isla Verde to Puna three leagues. Between Isla Verde and Puna the river is so broad, that the horizon is bounded by the sky, except in some few parts northwards. At Isla Verde it is about a league broad, and even something broader at Guayaquil, above which it contracts gradually, and forms other creeks, one facing the city, and another near the custom-house. These extend to such a distance from the principal river, as to form considerable islands. The tides in summer reach up to the custom-house, which cause the waters to swell; but in winter, the current being more rapid, this increase is visible only near Guayaquil: and in three or four different times, the first of these about Christmas, the tides are imperceptible. The swellings of this river principally arise from the torrents from the Cordillera. These floods shift the banks of sand between the city and Isla Verde, so that its navigation is rendered dangerous. Its borders, as well as those of the creeks and canals, are decorated with country-seats and cottages, and the intermediate spaces full of a variety of thickets. The principal and most common materials in buildings on this river are canes; these also form the inward parts, being constructed so with wood, as to have all the apartments on the first story, without any ground-floor. The vessels used on this river are called balzas, a sort of float or raft, consisting of five, seven, or nine beams fastened together, having a strong tilt of reeds, and a sail hoisted on two poles; on these are carried all the necessaries when they go fishing. These are not only used on rivers, but small voyages are made at sea in them, and sometimes they go as far as Paita. See Ulloa's Voyage.

The increase of fish in Guayaquil river is greatly hindered by the prodigious number of alligators in it that destroy them.

The commerce of Guayaquil consists in the products and manufactures of its jurisdiction, its port being the place where the goods from the provinces of Peru, Terra Firma, and Guatimala, consigned to the mountains, are landed; and those from the mountains, designed for the above-mentioned provinces, are brought thither, and shipped for their respective ports. Its principal product is cocoa, exported to Panama, and the ports of New Spain: timber is chiefly sent to Callao, vast quantities of salt exported to the inland towns of Quito, cotton, rice, and fish, both salted and dried, horned cattle, mules and colts in great numbers. Besides these, tobacco, wax, Guinea pepper, drugs, and lana de ceibo, the latter a kind of cotton produced from a very high and tufted tree, only used hitherto to fill mattresses.

The goods imported from Peru in return, are wine, brandy, oil and dried fruit. From Quito it receives baize, tucuyos, flour, papas, bacon, hams, cheese, and the like; from Panama, European goods purchased at the fairs. The principal commodities it receives from New Spain are, iron found in that country, but much inferior to that of Europe, being brittle and vitreous, also naphtha and tar for the use of shipping. From the same coast, as well as from Peru, they have also cordage.

The large kingdoms of Quito and Lima making a reciprocal exchange of their respective commodities, both natural and factitious, hence Guayaquil bears a share in it. Thus Lima sends the produce of its vine-yards and olive-yards; and Quito furnishes cloth, baize, tucuyos, serges, hats, stockings, and other woollen goods. But indigo being necessary for increasing the beauty of the colours, and none of it growing in the province of Quito, the merchants of Guayaquil import it from New Spain, and send it to the Quito manufacturers.

The summer is the proper season for carrying on these branches of commerce, because then the manufactures of the mountains may be brought down to Guayaquil, and the goods sent from other parts carried up to the mountainous parts. But the river Guayaquil is never without vessels loading with goods of that jurisdiction, the sea here being always open. And to the profits arising from this large and constant commerce is owing its present flourishing and magnificent state, notwithstanding its having been frequently pillaged by pirates and wasted by fire.

GUAYAQUIL, (jurisdiction of,) in Peru, in South America. Its most northern part begins at cape Passado, so called from its lying 21 degrees S. of the Equinoctial, and about half a degree N. of the bay of Maata. From this cape it continues all along the coast, including the isle of Puna, to the town of Machala on the coast of Tumbez, where it terminates in the jurisdiction of Piura. From thence it runs away eastward, and is bounded by that of Cuenca, and then turning northwards along the western skirts of the Andes, ends in those of Bamba and Chimbo. Its length from N. to S. is about 60 leagues; and its breadth from E. to W. 40 or 45, reckoning from the Point of Santa Elena to the parts called Ojibar. This whole country, like that in the neighbourhood of the city of its name, is one continued plain, and in winter universally overflowed. It is divided into seven departments, for each of which is appointed a lieutenant or deputy. These departments are Puerto Viejo, Punta de Santa Elena, Puna, Yaguache, Babahoyo, Baba, and Daule.

Ullóa makes the latitude of the city of Guayaquil 2, 11, S. Its longitude, computing it from the observations made at Quito, is 297, 17, reckoning from Teneriffe.

GUAYLAS, (province of,) one of the fifteen jurisdictions of Lima, in South America. It extends along the middle of the Cordillera, beginning about 50 leagues from Lima, in a N. N. E. direction. This jurisdiction is large, and has different temperatures of air. The low parts produce grain and fruit, while the upper abound in cattle and sheep, which form the greatest branch of trade carried on with the other provinces.

GUAYRA, a province of Paraguay, or Rio de la Plata, in South America. It is bounded on the N. by the unknown tracts of Brasil and the nation of the Tupiques, on the E. by the captainrie of St. Vincent in the same country, and partly by the Northern ocean; on the S. it has the province of Urvaica, and part of that of Parana; and on the W. the remainder of the same province, from which it is divided by the river of that name. Its greatest extent from E. to W. is computed about 150 leagues, and about 140 from N. to S. only its boundaries towards Brasil are unknown. The tropic of Capricorn cuts it almost into two equal parts, so that its climate must of course be very hot, though moist, on account of the vast dews and periodical rains: so that it is very fruitful in provisions and diseases; yet it was pretty well peopled at the first coming of the Spaniards, and had several towns, villages, &c. since destroyed, partly by sickness, and partly by the Brazilian Portuguese.

It is watered by several rivers, which fall into the Parapaná, which last descends from the southern mountains of Brasil, and is of a considerable magnitude before it falls into the Parana. The principal of those that fall into the Parapaná are, the Tibaxiva, Pirapus, and Itangua, besides some others of less note. Both sides of those rivers are covered with several sorts of trees, the most valuable among which are the cedars, very numerous, and so tall and large, that they make vessels of one single trunk, which will carry 20 oars. Other sorts produce excellent fruit, and some of them them produce a good kind of balsam. Among those woods harbour numberless wild beasts, of which tigers are the most dangerous. Snakes are also very numerous, large, and dangerous. Here are abundance of swine which range in the forests, with an excrescence on their backs, which if not cut off before they are killed, will corrupt and poison their flesh. Bees swarm every where, and yield plenty of very good honey; but the wax cannot be rightly whitened.

The Jesuits at their first coming built some towns along the rivers, the principal of which are our Lady of Loretto; and four leagues higher, that of San Ignatio, Itaburata, &c. and afterwards the natives, being protected by the Spaniards, built eleven more.

GUBEN, a neat, well-fortified town, and the most populous in Lower Lusatia, in Saxony, a circle in Germany. The Swedes took it thrice in the civil wars; the second time was under the marquis of Hamilton, then a general in the Swedish army, who put most of the garrison to the sword. Here is a woollen manufacture, and belongs to the family of Saxe-Mersburg. It lies 20 miles S. W. of Crossen, and 48 N. of Gorlitz. Lat. 51, 54, N. Long. 15, 12, E.

GUBER, a kingdom of Africa, in Nigroland. It is surrounded with high mountains; and the villages, which are many, are inhabited by people who are employed in taking care of their cattle and sheep. There are also abundance of artificers, and linen-weavers, who send their commodities to Tombuto. The whole country is overflowed every year by the inundations of the Niger, and at that time the inhabitants sow their rice. There is one town, which contains almost 6000 families, among whom are many merchants.

GUBIO, or CUBIO, in Latin Eugubium, anciently Iguvium, a county of Urbino, in the Ecclesiastical State, in Italy.

Its capital of the same name lies near the source of the river Chiasco, at the foot of the Appennines, and on the confines of the marquisate of Ancona, 26 miles S. of Urbino, and 16 from Perugia. It is the see of a bishop, immediately subject to the Pope.

GUENGA, a large river of the Hither India, in Asia; which rising in the mountains of Balagate, after a N. E. course, falls into the west arm of the Ganges, in Bengal.

GUERAND, a town of France, in Brittany, and in the county of Nantes. It carries on a considerable trade in white salt, and is about three miles from the sea, and 250 W. of Paris. Long. 2, 22, W. Lat. 47, 20, N.

GUERANDE, in Latin Gueranda, or Aula Quiriata, a pretty, considerable city of Nantes, in

G U

Brittany, a province of France. It lies between the mouths of the Vilaine and Loire. It has a collegiate church, also a parochial; an Ursuline convent of nuns; and another of nuns, who take care of the hospital for poor sick persons. The inhabitants are rich, and drive a good trade in white salt, manufactured from the neighbouring marshes, and loaded by the English and Dutch at the port of Croisille. An annual fair is held here, during which great numbers of horses are sold. It lies 13 miles below Nantes, to the W. three from St. Mazaire, and but one and a half from Croisille and the ocean.

GUERCHE, a town of France, in Touraine, with a castle. It is seated on the river Creuse, 10 miles S. E. of Haye. Long. 0, 57, E. Lat. 46, 48, N.

GUERET, in Latin Gueretum, Garactum or Varactum, the capital of La Marche, one of the governments of France. It lies in the Upper Marche, near the source of the river Gartempe. Though small it is the seat of a seneschalship, prebendal court and election, with an official for the bishop of Limoges. As the salt-duty is not established in this province, an officer is here to prevent exporting salt into the neighbouring provinces. Here is but one parochial church, a convent of Recollects, and another of Barnabites, founded by Varillas, the famous, though not very faithful, historian, who was a native of this place. It lies 32 miles N. E. of Limoges. Lat. 46, 16, N. Long. 2, 12, E.

GUERNSEY, an island in the English channel, on the coast of Normandy, subject to Britain; but, (as well as the adjacent islands,) governed by its own laws. See JERSEY. Of this island Dr. Campbell gives the following account: It lies 20 leagues S. W. from Weymouth in Dorsetshire, between eight and nine leagues W. from the coast of Normandy, 13 S. of Bretagne, seven N. W. from Jersey, five S. W. from Alderney, and two W. from Sarke; in length from N. E. to S. W. about 12 miles; in breadth, from S. to N. about nine; in circumference upwards of 30; containing 50 square miles, or 32,000 acres. The climate is mild and temperate, not subject to excessive heats, much less to severe cold; somewhat windy; but, taking all things together, equally healthy and pleasant. The soil is, generally speaking, rich and fertile; the country, though sufficiently inclosed with stone fences, yet more open than in Jersey, and as capable of cultivation of every kind. On the N. side the coast is commonly low and flat, rising gradually, so that on the S. side the cliffs are of a prodigious height. The face of the country is variegated with hills and little eminences, and tolerably well watered with springs and and sharp gravelly streams. There was formerly a fine lake, about half a league in extent, now filled up, and turned into a meadow, but many gentlemen have still very beautiful and convenient fish-ponds.

There are very few countries in the world more capable of improvement. Most of the rising grounds afford a short thick grass, equally beautiful to the eye, and succulent as pasture. Roots and herbs it produces of all kinds, esculent, medicinal, and aromatic, with a profusion of flowers that grow wild, and are exquisitely fragrant. All sorts of shrubs and fruit-trees flourish here; and there is some, though but little timber; not through any defect of soil or climate, but because they cannot conveniently afford it room. Grain they have of every species we cultivate in Britain, but more especially wheat; and though they have not either lime, chalk, or marle, yet the sea-wreck answers all the intention of manure, so well as to keep their ground in constant heat. They have large quantities of sheep, but small in size; and had formerly a very singular breed, of which the ewes had four horns and the rams six; but these are now become very scarce. Their black cattle are in such abundance, as not only to support their own uses, but to furnish also a considerable exportation; and their horses, though but little, are equally strong and hardy. The sea also furnishes a prodigious variety as well as plenty of fish, more especially red and grey mullet, excellent mackerel, and above all, conger eels. To these advantages we may add, that like Ireland, it is free from all venomous creatures.

There are in this island 10 parishes, each of which is divided into several vintons, for the more easy management of affairs, civil, ecclesiastical, and military, and the choice of their respective officers and magistrates. Though the country is very fully peopled, yet the houses are scattered up and down, according to the humour or the conveniency of the inhabitants: so that there is, properly speaking, but one town in the island, which is likewise the only haven of any resort; though there are some creeks on the N. and W. sides of the island, such as Bazon, L'Aucresse, Ferminer, St. Sampson, and the West Passage. All these ports are in a state of nature, but might be certainly improved and fortified, which would be productive of many advantages to the island; as was long ago observed and proposed to government by captain Yarranton. In the reign of king Charles II. when the French formed an insidious design of making themselves masters of this isle by treachery, it left such an impression on his majesty's mind, that some years after he sent over the lord Dartmouth, accompanied by certain engineers, who discovered on the N. W. side of the island, a deep bay, which, by the help of a mole, might cover a numerous squadron, even of ships of the line, under the protection of what was also intended to be built, a strong castle: but his exchequer being exhausted, this necessary work was never carried into execution. As this port would look full into the channel, it deserves consideration, how far it might be useful to us in the time of a French war, and of what infinite detriment it might prove if this island should ever fall into the hands of our enemies.

The inhabitants are very industrious in their respective employments, naturally sober, frugal in their manner of living, honest in their dealings, sincere in their religion, which is that of the church of England, and loyal to their princes, as well as steady to the British interest. They are, however, reserved to a degree that makes them sometimes thought morose; they are somewhat suspicious; and, which is their greatest error, they are, or at least were, very litigious. They have a stronger turn to grazing than to agriculture; and though they bring in annually some corn, yet in the same space they send out some hundred cattle. They are still more inclined to orchards, which enables them to make many thousand hogsheds of cider every year; of which, it being the common drink of the people, they export but little. The woollen is their principal manufacture, for the carrying on of which they are allowed to import 2000 tons from England, which they work up chiefly in stockings, waistcoats and breeches. They might certainly make their fishery turn to profit, more especially as of late years they have set up salt-works; and yet, except lobsters, I never heard that any of their fish went to a foreign market. Our merchants have large stocks of wine here, which they import as they have occasion. As they are enabled, by this method, to keep it to a proper age before they are obliged to pay the duty, it seems to be a benefit to the mother-country, by putting it in their power both to buy and sell cheaper: as on the other hand, from the rent of warehouses, the subsisting factors and their servants, the resort of ships employed in this trade, it must be very advantageous to the inhabitants of this island. They take from England some of the necessaries, and almost all the conveniencies, of life, such as corn, malt liquor, sugars, spices, coals, household furniture, many species of the iron and leather manufactures, grocery, haberdashery, and hard-ware, the balance is greatly in our favour; and must continually increase, in proportion as they augment in number.

and grow easier in circumstances. At present, upon a very moderate computation, there are in Guernsey upwards of 15,000 souls.

The several islets and vast chains of rocks that surround this country on every side, and cause such a variety of tides and currents, add much to the security of the place, by rendering it equally difficult and dangerous for ships to approach it, unless they have pilots aboard extremely well acquainted with the coast. On the S. side, the cliffs are prodigiously high; so that the old writers say, it looks like a park in the sea, impaled with rocks. On the W. side lie the Hanoys, or, as the French write them, Hanovaux, which cover that coast so effectually, that a descent there is little to be feared. At the N. W. extremity lies a little island called the Howe, which would be a very convenient place for a salt-work, glass-house, or manufactory of soap. At the N. E. extremity we meet with St. Michael in the Vale, a peninsula some miles in extent, connected with Guernsey by a very narrow isthmus, with bays that might be rendered useful on both sides. This peninsula is likewise guarded by rocks and islets, the most considerable of which are the Bryants, the Hummet, and the Hays. South-east from the Vale lies the island of Harnet, or Arne, about a league in compass, formerly desert, but now cultivated. At a league S. from thence lies Briehoe, of less extent; and between both, the little island of Gythau, or Jethau, which serves the governor for a kind of park, or rather paddock.

GUESCAR, an ancient city of Grenada, in Spain, anciently Aseua, or Escua, if not from the Moors ancient seat in Aragon, namely, Huesca. It lies at the foot of Mount Segra, which is always covered with snow, from which the rivers Guardadar and Bravate, descend on each side of the city. It has strong walls and towers, three gates, and a stout old castle. Its inhabitants consist of 800 families in two parishes, with two monasteries, and as many nunneries, and an hospital with five chapels. At this place about 400,000 hundred weight of wool are annually washed, in which 3000 men are sometimes employed. It lies 36 miles N. of Almeira, and 170 S. S. E. of Madrid.

GUESTLING, a village in Suffex, with a fair on May 23.

GUETA, an ancient town of Spain, in New Castile, 15 miles N. W. of Cuenza, and 70 E. of Madrid. Long. 1, 59. W. Lat. 40, 20. N.

GUETARIA, a town of Spain, in the province of Guipuscoa, with a castle and good harbour. Long. 2, 23. W. Lat. 43, 26. N.

GUIANA, a country of a vast extent in South

G R

America. It is bounded by that of the Amazons on the S. by part of Peru on the W. by Terra Firma, with part of the river Oroonoke on the N. and as that river runs northward, it bounds this country also partly on the W. On the N. it has also the mouth of the same river, and the Atlantic Ocean, which, by reason of the windings of the coast, bounds it likewise on the E. In it is included Surinam and Caen, or Equinoctial France. It lies between the Equator and lat. 8 deg. N. and between long. 50 and 65 W. extending from the mouth of the river Oroonoke to that of the Maragnon or Amazons. Its length, from the boundaries of Popayan to the Atlantic Ocean, is about 1140 miles. It is divided into two parts; namely, Guiana Proper, which is the inland country, and Caribbiana, lying along the coast; the former is called El Dorado, or the Gold-country, there being in this country, according to Sir Walter Raleigh, more gold than in the richest province of Peru.

This country is inhabited by a vast number of nations. But the sea-coast being the best known, it may be divided into Indian, French, and Dutch Guiana.

Indian Guiana contains all the country lying between the mouth of the river Amazons, to Cape d'Orange; that is, about 80 leagues, or 240 miles. It is all very low land, which near the sea side is almost overflowed. From the Equator to the N. Cape, the country is very little known. From Cape North to Cape d'Orange, there are no hills nor high grounds perceivable, only some trees seem as if they were planted in the sea, and there are several creeks and inlets of rivers and brooks which make the country look as if it were drowned. However, English, Dutch, and French barks often go thither to trade with the natives for seals; so that the rivers Aricari, Unimarnari, and Cassipouré, are pretty well known. Here the coast is very dangerous, on account of the high tides and great swell. The air is so unhealthy, that Europeans cannot bear it for any time. And even the natives are obliged to build their tents upon trees, which look like birds nests.

French Guiana, or Equinoctial France, contains about 80 leagues along the coast, beginning at Cape d'Orange, which is a low point of land that juts out into the sea, and is known by three little hills seen beyond it. These are on the other side of the river Oyapoc or Yapoco. From Cape d'Orange there is a large bank of muddy ground, that runs 10 or 12 leagues into the sea; so that at four or five leagues distance from the shore, there is but four fathoms and a half of water at low ebb, opposite to the point of that cape. The land upon one side of the river is very low, and almost continually drowned, but on the other are several fine hills. There the Indians, who are not numerous, have a well-cultivated settlement. At a league's distance from the river, along the coast, is mount Comaribo, where is a fine spring of fresh water, with a small creek of salt-water, where canoes and long-boats may land at a hundred miles westward of Cape d'Orange, in the easternmost point of the island of Cayenne.

Dutch Guiana, once English Guiana, from whom the former took it, begins at the river Maragnon, where the English had built a small fort, in lat. 6, 20, N. extending to the mouth of the river Oroonoke. The mouth of the Maragnon is choked up with several sand-banks, which often shift, so that no vessel above 20 tons can enter it, and those that do, not without danger, and are often a-ground. The soil is not good, till five or six leagues up; and all the coast, from Maragnon to Surinam; namely, about 55 miles, is low and drowned land; and even the banks of that river cannot be well inhabited, but about five leagues from its mouth upwards.

GUIAQUIL. See GUAYAQUIL.

GUIARA, a town of Terra Firma, in South America, with a harbour on the Caracoa coast. It lies 212 miles E. of Maracaibo, where the English were twice repulsed, and lost some men in the attacks which they made upon it in 1739 and 1743. Lat. 10, 39, N. Long. 66, 12, W.

GUIENNE, including Gascony, a government of France, and the largest in all that kingdom. It contains 13 provinces under one governor. It is bounded on the N. by Saintonge, Angomois and Limosin, on the E. by Auvergne and Languedoc, on the S. by the Pyrenean mountains, which divide it from Spain, and on the W. it has the Atlantic Ocean. It lies between lat 42, 25, and 45, 15, N. and between long. 1, 30, and 3, 0, W. Its extent from S. to N. is 56 geometrical leagues, reckoning 20 to a degree, is 168 English miles, from Vie de Sos on the Pyrenean mountains, to the borders of Limosin; and about 65 leagues in its greatest length, from St. Jean de Luz, to St. Genies in Rouergue, that is about 195 English miles; but towards the Pyrenean mountains it is much shorter, being pent in by Languedoc, Foix, and Roussillon.

Guienne is a corruption of the ancient Aquitani, though the province so called by the Romans was of a much larger extent, having been divided into Prima and Secunda, and comprizing then all the country between the Loire and the Pyrennees.

The provinces which constitute the government of Guienne are, Guienne Proper, Perigord, Quercy, Rouergue, Bazadois, Agenois, Condomois, Armagnac, Cominges, Conserans, Bigorre, Gascony, (subdivided into Landes, Chalosse and Turfan,) Soules and Labourd.

GUIENNE, (Proper,) is bounded to the N. by Saintonge, to the E. by Perigord and Agenois, to the S. by Bazadois and Gascony, having the ocean to the W. Bourdeaux is its capital, as well as that of the whole government.

This is a very fruitful country, and carries on a considerable trade, particularly in wine, of which it annually exports from Bourdeaux about 100,000 casks.

GUILDSBOROUGH, a Roman camp, of a square form, near the field where the battle of Naseby was fought, in Northamptonshire. It has a deep ditch called the Burrows.

GUILDFORD, a large well-built town of Surrey, on the river Wey, divided here by a heap of sand into two branches, yet navigable from thence to the Thames. It is a borough, governed by a mayor, who returns two members to parliament. It had three churches, two of which, namely, Trinity and S. Mary, were united; but in 1740 the former fell down. Guildford is reckoned the greatest market in England for wheat, and is kept on Saturday. The assizes are often held here; and the election of knights for the shire-always. Its school was founded by king Edward III. Here is a handsome alms-house, called Trinity-hospital, founded and endowed by Dr. George Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, who was born here, and is buried in Trinity-church. Here are also two charity-schools for 30 boys and 20 girls, taught and clothed by subscription, which, with the offertory of its two churches, is applied to the teaching 20 more poor children. By the navigation of its river, great quantities of timber are brought to London, not only from its neighbourhood, but the woody parts of Suffex and Hampshire, being brought hither in summer by the land carriages. A good deal of the corn which is bought at Farnham market is brought to the mills on this river, where it is ground and dressed, and sent down in the meal by means of barges to London. Considerable estates were formerly raised here by its cloth-manufacture, the above-mentioned archbishop with his brother Dr. Robert Abbot, bishop of Salisbury, and Sir Maurice Abbot, having been the sons of a clothier of this town, of which trade there are still some remains hereabouts. Near the town is a fine circular course for horse-races, where king William founded a plate of 100 guineas, to be run for every May, after Newmarket races are over. From the town is an ascent to St. Catharine's Marine's hill, on which stands, the gallows, so placed, that it may be seen from the high street. This hill running W. almost to Farnham, is a ridge no wider than the road, and all of chalk; the wheat hereabouts having a red stalk is very good, of the same nature with the famous Suffex wheat. A little way from it are two round hillocks, called Robin Hood's Bulls. Its annual fairs are on May 4, and November 22. It lies 31 miles S. W. of London, and seven from Farnham.

GUILDFORD, an inland county in the district of Salisbury, in N. Carolina.

GUILLAIN, (St.) a town of the Austrian Netherlands, in Hainault, and in the provostship of Mons, which it defends by its sluices. It has been several times taken and retaken; but last of all by the French in 1746. It is seated in marshy land on the river Haine, five miles from Mons. L. ng. 3, 54, E. Lat. 50, 25, N.

GUILLESTRE, a small town in the territory of Ambrunois, belonging to the province of Dauphiny, in France. It lies 10 miles N. E. of Ambrun, and 16 S. W. of Briançon. Lat. 44, 52, N. Long. 6, 26, E.

GUIMARENES, an ancient town of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal, was formerly the royal residence. It stands on a hill, and is walled round. Its castle is old and strong, and the royal palace a venerable structure; besides many other handsome buildings. It contains about 1000 inhabitants, in four parishes; one of which is collegiate, with two monasteries, a nunnery, a house of mercy, and a good hospital. The chief manufacture here is linen and fine thread, large quantities of which are made and exported. It lies 10 miles E. of Braga, and 150 N. of Lisbon.

GUINEA, a large country of Africa. It is said to lie, though accounts vary, between latitude 4, and 10 degrees N. and between long. 15 deg. E. and 15 deg. W. It is bounded to the N. by Nigritia or Negroland, to the E. by unknown lands, to the S. and W. by Congo and the Atlantic Ocean. It is divided into Upper and Lower Guinea, and these chiefly comprehend the four following coasts or subdivisions; the Grain-coast, the Ivory-coast, from the plenty of elephants teeth found there, the Gold-coast, as furnishing most gold, and the Slave-coast, from whence slaves are purchased.

In the coast of Upper Guinea the air is very scorching from October to March, but tolerable in the other six months. Its insalubrity seems principally owing to the heat of the day and coolness of the night, which produce contrary effects in the body; add to this, that the country, especially the Gold-coast, being from one end to the other full of high mountains, a thick stinking mist arises from the intermediate vallies, with other stench of putrifying fish, and the uncleanness, of the inhabitants.

The national diseases here are the small-pox and worms; the former sweeping away many thousands, and the latter miserably affecting all parts of their bodies, particularly their legs, with excruciating pains, till they can get the worm out, that being sometimes a month, and this they do by gradually winding it round a stick with great care; for if the worm happens to break, the remainder either rots in the body, or breaks out at some other place. Some of these worms are an ell long and upwards.

The Negroes are all, without exception, crafty, villainous, fraudulent and seldom to be trusted. They are prone to sloth and idleness, incredibly careless and stupid, being equally unmoved at good or ill success. Their youths, or manceroes, are extravagantly vain, and, though only slaves, carefully adorn their bodies. But the caboceroes, or principal people, are very modestly and plainly habited. They are very sober in their diet; but the men and women are great lovers of strong liquors.

There are five degrees of men among the Negroes of Guinea; namely, their kings or captains, their caboceroes, or chief men, who take care of the welfare of the town or village; the third, those who have acquired reputation by their riches, who often serve the Dutch as footmen; the fourth are employed in agriculture and fishing; and the fifth, slaves.

The Negroes mostly along the coast of Guinea, are all idolators, and each particular person has his peculiar god. They reckon their time by the shining of the moon; from which they collect when it is proper to sow.

The English, Dutch, French, and some other European nations, have factories and forts upon this coast; the Dutch have quite dispossessed the Portuguese from thence, after they had been masters of the whole coast upwards of 100 years. Several petty princes and states in the inland country who are generally at war, sell their prisoners for slaves, or steal them, and bring them down to the coast; and some will sell their nearest relations, if they can have an opportunity. The traders not only visit the Guinea coast, but all the W. coast of Africa, from Cape Verd at the mouth of the Niger in lat. 15, N. to Cape Negro in lat. 18 S. where they meet with the same merchandise.

GUINEA, (New,) a long and narrow island of the East Indies, very imperfectly known. It was supposed to be connected with New Holland, until Captain Cook discovered the strait which separates them. New Guinea, including Papua, its north-western part, (which according to Bougainville's ville's conjecture is separated from it by a strait,) reaches from the equator to the 12th degree of S. lat. and from 121 to 150 deg. E. long. in one part it does not appear to be above 50 miles broad. It was first visited by an European ship in 1529. Saavedra, a Portuguese, who made the discovery of the N. W. part of this country, called it Terra de Papuas or Papos. Van Schouten, a Dutch discoverer, afterwards gave the name of New Guinea to its south-western part. Admiral Roggewain also touched here; and before him Dampier, 1st January, 1700. Captain Cook made the coast of New Guinea, in lat. 6, 15. long. 138, E. on the 3d of September, 1775.

The land here is very low, as is every other part of the coast; but it is covered with a luxuriance of wood and herbage that can scarcely be conceived. Here the cocoa-nut, plantain, and bread-fruit, flourish in the highest perfection.

GUINGAMP, a small city in the duchy of Penthièvre, of which it is the most considerable place, and in the district of Treguier, in Upper Brittany, in France. It lies very agreeably, amidst several large meadows, on the banks of a small river, which serves as a ditch to its walls. Here is a large church with two high towers, and an Augustine abbey. In the middle of the city is a large square, in which all the houses are very well built. It lies three leagues from St. Brieux, on the E. and six from Treguier on the N.

GUIPISCOA, a subdivision of Biscay, one of the provinces of Spain. It runs along the coast of the N. bay. It is bounded westward by Biscay Proper, and part of Alava, southward by Alava and Navarre, and eastward by Navarre and France.

GUISE, a town of Thierache, in Upper Picardy, in France, in Latin, Castrum Guisium, or Guizæ, on the river Oyse, towards the confines of Hainault. It is well fortified with a castle and other strong ramparts; so that it has stood out several sieges; the last was in 1650, by archduke Leopold.

The duchy is very large, extending itself not only to Picardy, but also to Champagne. In this city the French kings have constantly kept a governor, on account of its lying on the frontiers of the Low Countries, and so serving as a bulwark to France on that side. It lies 48 miles E. of Amiens. Lat. 49, 59, N. Long. 3, 42, E.

GULEN, a river in Norway, which buried itself in the sandy soil of that country, in 1344, but burst forth soon after, and destroyed 250 of the inhabitants, besides several churches, houses, and great quantities of cattle.

GUILCK. See JULIERS.

GUNDELFINGEN, a town of Germany, in Suabia, with a handsome castle, seated on the river Danube, 15 miles from Ulm, and eight N. of Burgaw. Long. 10, 31, E. Lat. 48, 36, N.

GUNDELSHEIM, a town of Germany in Suabia, and in Graichow, seated on the river Neckar, with a castle on an eminence.

GUNFLEET, one of the channels in the mouth of the Thames, by which shipping enter that river, and where some of our men of war ride at anchor.

GUN-ISLAND, in Chesapeake Bay, where governor Dunmore retired with the friends of Government, from Virginia.

GUNTSBERG, a town of Suabia, in Germany, and in the territory of Burgaw, the Guntienfis Transitus of the ancients, and called Contia in the time of the emperor Constantius. It stands high on the E. shore of the Danube; over which is a bridge here; it has a magnificent castle, the residence of the Austrian governor. It lies 14 miles N. E. of Ulm. Lat. 48, 41, N. Long. 10, 21, E.

GUNTZENHAUSEN, a town of Germany, in Franconia, 5 miles from Weissemburg; seated on the river Altmul, near a forest, and belongs to the Margrave of Anspach.

GURCK, a town of Lower Carinthia, in Austria, in Germany. It stands on a river of its name, is the see of a bishop, under Saltzburg in spirituals, but swears fealty to the emperor for his temporals, the election being for two turns in the latter to the former's once. His residence is at Straßburg on the Gurck. Lat. 47, 25, N. Long. 14, 12, E.

GURIEL, a subdivision of Georgia, a province of Asia. It lies on the E. coast of the Euxine sea, and is subject to the Turks.

GUSTROW, a pretty large and well-fortified town of Mecklenburg, in Lower Saxony, in Germany. Here is a fine castle, formerly the residence of the dukes of its name, now extinct; with a very elegant garden. It lies 31 miles E. of Schwerin. Lat. 53, 51, N. Long. 12, 21, E.

GUTSKOW, (county of,) a subdivision of Upper or Swedish Pomerania, in Germany. It formerly included Gripswald, Loytz; and the abbey of Eldenow. It had formerly its own counts, but now belongs to Prussia.

Its capital of the same name lies on the Pene. It was the first town in these parts that received Christianity, from Otton, bishop of Bamberg, being then a place of eminence, but it has since dwindled into a village; and here was once a collegiate church, on whose synod several parishes depended. It lies between Anclam and Loytz, eight miles S. of Gripswald, 10 W. of Wolgast, and 30 S. E. of Stralsund. Lat. 53, 51, N. Long. 13, 46, E.

GUTTA,

GUTTA, a town of Upper Hungary, strongly fortified ever since 1624. It lies in the island of Schutt, formed by the E. branch of the Danube, 32 miles E. of Presburg. Lat. 48, 31, N. Long. 52, 8, E.

GUZURAT. See CAMBAYA.

GUYARMATH, a town of Hungary Proper. It lies on the river Samos.

GUYSHORN, a town of Lunenburg and Lower Saxony, in Germany. It lies on the Aller, about 51 miles N. E. of Hanover, and subject to the elector of the latter name and king of Great Britain. Lat. 52, 55, N. Long. 10, 51, E.

GUXULA, a town of Hungary Proper. It was formerly fortified; but having been taken by the Turks, in 1566, has been dismantled.

Near it is a town of the same name, in an island formed by the Koros.

GWANA, a river in Pembrokehire, which runs into the Gwyn near Llanachaieth.

GWGER, a river in Anglesey, which runs into the Irish sea below Llanbaderick.

GWELLY, a river in Caernarvonshire, which runs into the Irish sea by Dinas Dynlle.

GWENDRATHVAG, a river in Caernar-

GWENROW, a river in Denbighshire, which runs into the Dee below Wrexham.

GWILLY, a river in Caernarthenhire, which runs into the Towy at Abergwilly.

GWTHRIN, in Denbighshire, in N. Wales, with a fair on May 6.

GWYN, a river in Pembrokehire, which runs into the Irish sea near Llanlawyn.

GWYNT, or GYNT, a river in Anglesey, which runs into the Kewenny opposite Llangruffol.

GWYTHEL, a river in Radnorshire, which runs into the Arro near Kyneton.

GYRROW, a river in Denbighshire, which runs into the Alwen below Bettus.

GYRTONE, mentioned by Pliny, was the capital of the kingdom of Orestes.

GYTHITIS, one of the islands which pertained to Ethiopia.

GYTHIUM, a sea-port of Sparta, situated at a small distance from Trinassus, was famous according to tradition of its inhabitants, for having been built by Apollo and Hercules.
